Foods that Will Interest the Family

By NELLIE MAXWELL

"Our spectacular opportunities for courage may be few or none at all. Our commonplace opportunities for courage start when we wake and last until we go to sleep. The courage of the commonplace is greater than the courage of the crisis."

For the cake par excellence, the torte is one of the simplest. Our German cooks excel in this kind of a cake combination. They are rich with nuts, chopped or rolled fine, plenty of eggs and crumbs, with spices. The baking is another important point, as slow, careful baking is necessary for a light and tender torte.

Schaum Torte.—Beat three egg whites until stiff but not dry, add one cupful of sugar very lightly and gradually, not to lose the lightness, a pinch of salt, one-half teaspoonful of vinegar and one-half teaspoonful of vanilla. Bake in two deep layer tins for one hour. Put together with whipped cream, or add nuts and chopped pineapple with the cream.

Walnut Torte.—Beat the yolks of six eggs with one cupful of sugar, add one-fourth pound of walnuts and six lady fingers grated, two tablespoonfuls of flour and one teaspoonful of baking powder. Add the juice and rind of a lemon and when all the ingredients are well mixed, add the stiffly beaten egg whites to which a pinch of salt has been added. Bake in layers in a moderate oven and use the following:

Filling.—To one beaten egg yolk add two tablespoonfuls of sugar and three-fourths of a cupful of milk. Cook, stirring constantly until the mixture coats the spoon, add one and one-half cupfuls of grated walnut meats with a flavoring of almond and vanilla. Use between the layers and ice the top of the torte.

Date Torte.—Rub sixteen dates to a smooth paste with two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice. Beat two whole eggs, add seven yolks, add one and three-fourths cupfuls of sugar, beat well, add the dates, three tablespoonfuls of grated chocolate and one teaspoonful each of cinnamon, allspice, and a cupful of cracker crumbs. Stir well and fold in the stiffly beaten whites of seven eggs. Bake in a large spring form forty minutes.

but is equally as good. Press three ripe peaches after peeling and stoning, through a sieve, add two tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar and the well-beaten yolks of three eggs; fold in the stiffly beaten whites of six eggs and pour into a well buttered baking dish. Bake 15 or 20 minutes and serve at once.

Cherry and Quince Soup.—Stem and stone a pint of deep red cherries; place them in a saucepan with the juice and grated rind of a lemon, half a cupful of quince juice and a pint of water; cook until the cherries are tender, then thicken with cornstarch and cook until the starch is well cooked. Serve hot.

Attractive Headgear for Weddings

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Lovelier than ever are the hats which crown with glory the heads of bridesmaids who have been chosen to add their picturesque presence to the spring wedding pageant.

Due to the favor expressed for very sheer and lacy straw and other media, there is a fragile beauty about this season's models which is captivating. Tuned to the exquisite delicacy of the materials of which these enchanting confections are made, are their fairy-like colorings—opaline colors—to speak of these delectable tones and tints correctly.

All that fashion's followers have been hearing of late in regard to a return of romance in millinery, a revival of flowers, ribbons and feminine graces, together with the picturesque tilt and tilt of brims because of their lately acquired bandeaux, is confirmed in the sketches herewith.

The immensity of some of the new brims is a matter of comment this season. One of the very wide brims is seen at its loveliest in the first sketch in this group. The original of this model is of transparent crin in a pale rose opaline tint. To carry out the scheme successfully, each bridesmaid in the party will wear a duplicate of this lovely creation in a different color.

The lacy straw capeline in the upper corner to the right is in natural color, the idea being to trim each hat with ribbon in a color tuned to the frock with which it is worn. Trimming is conspicuous by its absence when it comes to the exquisite hair shape shown in the center of the picture to the left, the emphasis being placed on the deftly draped brim and the fact that the color of each hat is for the coterie of the bride's attendants is different, achieving a symphony of opalescent tones and tints. A perfectly charming version of the smaller-brimmed hat is centered to the right in the illustration the arrangement of the flowers and the ribbon bespeaking true artistry of the designer.

The little Watteau hat down in the lower left hand corner is a millinery gem. It is lace and straw, the flowers are every color and the ribbon is velvet, for velvet ribbon is a trimming featured throughout the mode this season.

A deftly draped flower-trimmed hat of very sheer hair braid is shown in the opposite right-hand corner.

The group concludes with a huge

Poisons absorbed into the system from souring waste in the bowels, cause that dull, headachy, sluggish, bilious condition; coat the tongue; foul the breath; sap energy, strength and nerve-force. A little of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin will clear up trouble like that, gently, harmlessly, in a hurry. The difference it will make in your feelings over night will prove its merit to you.

Dr. Caldwell studied constipation for over forty-seven years. This long experience enabled him to make his prescription just what men, women, old people and children need to make their bowels help themselves. Its natural, mild, thorough action and its pleasant taste commend it to everyone. That's why "Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin," as it is called, is the most popular laxative drugstore sell.

BOB WHITE SEES THINGS

LOOKING down from the tall tree close by Farmer Brown's hen-house, Bob White saw many strange things. At least they were strange to him. In the first place there were a great many big birds, something like Mrs. Grouse, only a great deal bigger, some brown, some white, some black and white, some speckled. They were in a yard made of that queer stuff that fences are often made of—wire. Some of them seemed to want to get out and Bob couldn't understand why they didn't fly out. He thought them very stupid. Some were walking in or out of the house, and that seemed queer to Bob, who never had been in any kind of a house in all his life.

One or two inside the house were making a great fuss about something, crying, "Cut, cut, cut—cut!" over and over again. Bob thought them very noisy creatures. If he had known that they were making all that noise because they had laid some eggs he would have thought them sillier than he did. No bird in his sense on the Green Meadows, or in the Green Forest would ever even hint that she had laid an egg. Such things are not told there. It isn't safe, and a bird who did tell would be thought crazy. But the strangest thing Bob looked down on was—guess what? It was a little brown bird who looked just like himself only different. It was his lost darling, the one whom he had seen falling to the ground after the bang of the hunter's terrible gun, and whom he had thought killed. Bob knew him right away, of course. And yet he looked strangely different. This was because there were strips of cloth bound round his body to keep that broken wing in place so that it could and would mend. Of course, Bob had never seen anything like that before and he didn't know just what to make of it.

"Who Did You Say Did This for You?" Inquired Bob.

But he didn't waste any time thinking about it. With a glad little cry he flew down into the henyard. Then he discovered why his lost baby (he wasn't a baby any longer, but Bob thought of him as such) hadn't come to him instead of calling him away over there. He hadn't come because he couldn't. He was a prisoner in a wire pen. There was wire over the top as well as around the sides. The little Bob White couldn't get out. Neither could Bob get in. Yes, sir; that little Bob White was a prisoner.

At first Bob thought this terrible, but there was a great deal of shrewdness and wisdom in that handsome little head of his, and after he had been told all the things that had happened to the little Bob White—how he had been picked up by Farmer Brown's boy and tenderly cared for, and given plenty of food and water—he began to understand that being a prisoner probably had saved the young Bob's life. He couldn't get out of his prison, but neither could Reddy Fox, nor Redtail the Hawk, nor any of his enemies get in. Outside of that pen and unable to fly he might have been caught by some of his enemies, but inside that pen he was perfectly safe.

"Who did you say did this for you?" Inquired Bob, as they touched bills through the wire netting. "The boy who watched us so much in the garden last summer," was the reply. "Here he comes now. I wouldn't wonder if he is bringing me something nice to eat." Bob White looked up hastily. There was Farmer Brown's boy just entering the henyard. Bob flew up to the top of the tall tree. He felt safe there, for his quick eyes had seen that there was no terrible man. When he looked down what do you think he saw? Why the young Bob White feeding from Farmer Brown's boy's hand! (By J. G. Lloyd.—WNU Service.)

BLOWING ON THE CARDS

YOU will often see card players blow on a pack of cards before they deal, or if it is not their deal, notice that they blow upon the hand dealt them before they begin to play "for luck." This ought to help some in "raking in the pot," for it is not only a bit of magic—the magic of transference—in itself, but it is also an appeal to the moon-goddess. Laila. Mention has already been made of the idea of the primitive man that the breath was the soul, or at least, strongly identified with it—a supernatural as well as a natural attribute of human beings. Many mythological stories and many customs of savage peoples today might be cited in this connection. Therefore, when a man blows his breath upon a pack of cards, or a "hand" of cards, he may be expected to transmit to them something of his own ego so that the cards will behave in harmony with his desires. And also we must not forget our old friend Pliny's statement that "The moon may fairly be considered the planet of breath because it saturates the earth, and by its approach fills bodies, while by its departure it empties them."

As Laila is the great "original moon goddess"—or Astarte; apparently they were the same—the later moon-goddesses being guilty of infringement of copyright, the blowing of breath upon the cards is an invocation to her for the granting of a straight flush, or at least some minor blessing of the sort.

The Old Gardener Says:

HOME owners usually shy at the idea of installing tile drains, and yet this practice is not expensive and often works wonders in making land available for lawns and for gardens. A 4-inch tile placed 2 1/2 feet deep, with a drop of 1/4 inch to a foot, is surprisingly successful in carrying off excess water. A grade of 1-10 of an inch to a foot, is safe if the tile is carefully laid. If there is no lower ground or a brook to receive the water, a blind well should be constructed. This means the drain and filling it in with stones. Then the water works down through the stones and gradually soaks away.

TRUE GREATNESS

A TIMELY and most interesting article appears in a recent issue of an important financial magazine entitled: "Grand Duke Alexander Urges Spiritual Education." The writer quotes the grand duke as follows: "We are spiritual illiterates. Only with spiritual education shall we achieve a spiritual democracy. Without spiritual education civilization cannot endure. The whole fabric of civilization, even in America, is strained to the breaking point by the accumulating weight of material advancement." It is also interesting to note that one of the foremost statisticians of our own country, Roger W. Babson, in a recent monthly report, said that material prosperity cannot endure without the reinforcement of spiritual ideals.

That both of the above statements are correct, history will readily prove. Civilization had advanced to a very remarkable extent and wealth was in abundance in the last days of the Roman empire. Extravagance and debauchery of public morals was also a marked feature of these last days. There was no spiritual idealism to furnish an adequate motive power or purpose in life, so the masses followed the line of least resistance and surrendered to the prevailing immorality. The result was the fall of the Roman empire. All her great wealth and advanced civilization were powerless to save her in the absence of a spiritual idealism. When we ask what we have left from the splendor of ancient civilizations, the answer must make us pause, for all we do have left to us is their poetry and art, created in periods of suffering and struggle rather than in times of material prosperity.

True greatness is achieved not in possessing something, whether it be wealth, knowledge or what not, but in the proper distribution of what we possess. Material prosperity which boasts only of its great possessions is bound to repeat the failures of history. It cannot stand on its own strength. "Without spiritual education civilization cannot endure." No civilization is secure that depends only upon its banks, markets or economic power. The most important factor in a manufacturer's business is not the material used in the factory but the men who use these materials. The most important element in warfare is not the equipment of the army but the morale of the army.

The greatness of a nation, like an individual, is the greatness of the ideals within that give life its inspiring incentives and enduring power. (By 1921, Western Newspaper Union.)

LIVE STOCK

METHODS TO PREVENT SWEET CLOVER BLOAT

Best Plan to Feed Well Before Pasturing.

Iowa farmers suffer many losses from bloat that might be prevented, believes F. S. Wilkins, chief in forage crop investigations at Iowa state college. With the increased use of sweet clover pasture, the possibility of bloat in cattle has increased and care must be taken not to turn the cattle onto the pasture too soon. The most severe losses are found during the seasons of heaviest rainfall, and precaution must be taken in turning stock onto wet fields.

Among the best methods to prevent bloat in pasturing sweet clover and other legumes is to see that stock are well fed before they are turned onto the pasture. Some good dry roughage will aid materially in decreasing the danger of bloat.

Plenty of water should always be available since thirsty stock are likely to drink too much when they have an opportunity and this increases danger from bloat. It is a good practice to keep air-slaked lime in the water and to keep a mixture of equal parts of salt and air-slaked lime before the stock at all times. After the animals have become accustomed to the pasture, they should be kept there continuously, otherwise they will have to be carefully watched each time they are turned in to prevent bloat.

Raising Karakul Breed of Sheep Is Described

Karakul sheep, a breed raised chiefly for the production of lambkins suitable for fur, are comparatively new in this country. Only a limited number are now in the United States, and direct importations from Bokhara, their native country, are prohibited by law to prevent the introduction of disease. Farmers Bulletin 1632-F, Karakul Sheep, just issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, gives essential information regarding this breed. The bulletin is intended chiefly for persons who contemplate raising Karakul sheep. Lambkins produced from Karakul lambs are divided into three main classes, known commercially as broad-tail, Persian lamb, and caracul. Of these, broad-tail is the most valuable, but the percentage produced of this type of skin is very small, the bulletin explains. Fur skins from grade Karakul ewes have not brought favorable prices. However, experimental work indicates that if grade ewes of the more available American type are mated with desirable pure-bred Karakul rams for successive generations, high-grade Karakul sheep can be developed whose lambs will be as satisfactory as pure-breds for the production of fur.

Push March Pigs Along for High Market Price

"It does not pay to hold back the March farrowed pigs to feed them out on new corn," says Prof. W. E. Carroll, University of Illinois. "Most farmers figure that corn is too high to feed spring pigs and consequently pay dearly for their new corn by taking a lower price." The heavy rains of the year come in the fall and winter months and generally depress the price," says Professor Carroll. "There was a difference of $1.20 in the cost of producing summer-fed and the fall-fed hog and a market difference of $9.50 in favor of the 225-pound hog that went to market in September instead of December." Professor Carroll declares, "Thus there was a net difference of $8.30 in favor of the hog that was fed out on old corn and marketed in September."

Live Stock Notes

Probably more silage can be fed with safety after lambing than before.

A small amount of good quality clover or alfalfa hay seems to be tremendously worth while in the cattle ration.

Live stock men know that silage location affects time required to feed. Silage should not have to be hauled to distant feed bunk.

Thin, wormy lambs, known as culis, pewees and skips, arrive by the thousands on our farms summer and fall markets where they sell for several dollars less than fat, thrifty lambs of the same age and breeding.

Scrub lambs are a losing proposition. On the average they bring $4.14 less per hundred than lambs of desirable quality.

All thoroughbred race horses descend in direct male line from three stallions, the Byrly Turk, the Darley Arabian and the Godolphin Barb.

There are certain factors that have to be watched in feeding corn silage to in-lamb ewes, namely condition or quality and amount. Extreme methods are always bad.

Larvae of Mosquitoes Destroyed by Oxygen

Oxygen, usually essential to life, is fatal to mosquitoes in the wiggler stage, it has been found at Cornell university, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. The discovery introduces a bottom-growing plant, called chara, which gives off minute bubbles of oxygen. In pools of water where chara was growing, no mosquito larvae were found, while others that contained no chara were prolific breeding places.

It was thought that the oxygen produced by the plant might be responsible, and to prove it, mosquito larvae were placed in jars filled with water. Oxygen bubbles were admitted to some of the containers, while the others were left undisturbed. In a few days the larvae from the jars without oxygen emerged as mosquitoes, but all in the other jars had died.

WHEN YOU CAN'T QUIT

Fatigue is the signal to rest. Obey it if you can. When you can't, keep cool and carry on in comfort. Bayer Aspirin was meant for just such times, because it insures your comfort. Freedom from pains that nag at nerves and wear you down. One tablet will block a threatening headache while it's still just a threat. Take two or three tablets when you have caught a cold, and that's usually the end of it.

Carry Bayer Aspirin when you travel. Have some at home. It will often "save the day."

From a grumbling tooth to those rheumatic pains, Bayer Aspirin is ready with its quick relief—and it always works. Neuritis. Neuralgia. Any nagging, needless pain.

Get the genuine tablets, stamped with the Bayer cross. Why experiment with imitations costing a few cents less? The saving is too little. There is too much at stake. But there is economy in the purchase of genuine Bayer Aspirin tablets in the large bottles.

Bad Stomach Cause of Bad Skin

You can't expect to have a good clear skin if your stomach is weak and disordered. Undigested food sends poisons through the body, pimples appear—skin grows sallow and loses color. But these troubles will end quickly and skin clear up if you will start today taking Tanlac.

Tanlac is made from herbs, barks and roots. A tablespoonful before each meal stimulates the digestion naturally so that you can digest what you eat. And when your stomach is in good shape again watch how quickly skin begins to clear up. At your druggist's. Money back if it doesn't help you.

BE PREPARED TO CHECK COCCIDIOSIS IN CHICKS

"The most important factors in controlling coccidiosis, a dreaded chick disease which affects the birds between the ages of three and twelve weeks are the prompt recognition of the disease and the prompt application of sanitary measures." This information was given out by L. P. Doyle of the Purdue University Veterinary Department and Leon Todd Extension poultryman of Purdue as an aid to poultrymen in brooding chicks this spring.

A characteristic drowsiness or sleepiness, ruffled feathers and a loss of appetite will usually be the first symptom, the Purdue men stated. If the digestive tract of an affected bird is examined, evidence of coccidiosis may be found in the 2 blind intestines or caeca or in other portions of the intestine. These caeca will usually be filled with a bloody or cheesy material which may range from yellow to purple in color. In the other portions of the intestine there may be gray or red specks.

When it is possible to detect the first few birds which become infected they can be removed and the house thoroughly cleaned before the disease spread through the flock. The sick birds should be killed and burned. The litter and all dirt sticking to the floor should be removed at once, and if possible for the birds to be confined to a small pen out doors, the house may be scrubbed with hot lye water. It is also a good practice to scrub the feed hoppers and water fountains at the same time. When a clean area of ground is available the house may be moved away from the place where the trouble started. The litter should then be cleaned from the house every other day until the disease has disappeared.

It was pointed out by the Purdue men that coccidiosis germs will live in the ground or in the brooder house from one year to another. The trouble may also be brought into the flock on the feet of the attendant or visitors, dogs or other animals and wild birds may bring it to the range. Second hand feed sacks may be responsible for introducing the disease. The hens may have a chronic form of this disease which can be spread to the chicks when the two ages of birds range together.

Each year this disease takes a large number of chicks, and causes many more to be stunted in growth. This simple cleaning process has been used with success by poultrymen throughout Indiana, and has the decided advantage of requiring no additional cash outlay.

The calyx spray is important for controlling apple worm and curculio.

If you are going to set out any cherry trees set them in light, well drained soil.

A garden tractor is a good investment for the commercial vegetable gardener.

Nursery grown trees and shrubs make the best growth if they are properly handled.

Either rake and burn all rubbish in the garden, or plow it at least eight inches deep.

Eight thousand bushels of field selected, fire dried, certified seed corn are available for Indiana farmers this year. Certified seed is true to variety, and of high quality.

When chicks crowd, there is a reason. It may be too much or not enough heat; too many chicks for the size of the house; not enough fresh air, especially at "bedtime;" not enough roosting poles.

The yellows, resistant varieties of cabbage are Wisconsin Globe, Wisconsin All Head Select, Marion Market, Iscopes, Indiana Cabbage, Wisconsin All Seasons, Wisconsin Hollander, Wisconsin No. 9, and Wisconsin Brunswick. These varieties will grow where ordinary varieties will be killed by yellows disease in the soil.

BROODER TEMPERATURES

(By Prof. Paul G. Riley)

It has been the experience of people who are operating battery brooders that a temperature of 85 degrees is warm enough for baby chicks.

The usual recommendation, where either coal or oil stoves are used in the brooder houses, is to start with a temperature of 95 degrees, with a thermometer hanging at the edge of the hover about two inches off the floor. This means that when the baby chicks go to bed at night, they are about a foot outside of the edge of the hover, because they will hunt the temperature in which they are comfortable.

As they get older, chicks need less heat, and the temperature of the stove should be reduced so that the inner edge of the circle of chicks will continue to stay about a foot away from the edge of the hover.

It is not possible to give definite temperatures, because it is necessary that the caretaker watch the chicks and reduce the temperature of the stove so that these chicks don't form the habit of sleeping too far away.

If the temperature is kept too high, the chicks will keep backing up until they get into the corners of the house, and then they will start piling. Once the chicks are either too hot or too cold, you are almost sure to have trouble with crowding, with consequent poor feathering, slow growth and often heavy mortality.

Incorrect temperatures are the most likely cause of chicks piling up.

ORGANIZING A JERSEY CALF CLUB.

A meeting was held in the County Agent's office where a committee of Vocational Teachers met, with the Jersey Cattle men and formulated plans for a Jersey Calf Club in DeKalb County.

It was decided that pure bred Jersey calves should be used in this club work. (Preferably calves that have a high production record behind them with the idea in mind that club member would then be eligible to enter his calf in the Parish show.)

This is an ideal time to buy pure bred stock as the price is lowest in years.

Any boy or girl between ages of 10 and 20 years may enter this club. If the club member already has a calf, it may be used if it meets the requirements of the club.

The Project will be divided into three periods as follows:

First or Calf Year: This period should be started when the calves are first purchased and end with a calf club show when the calves are approximately one year of age.

Second or Heifer Year: This period should start when the calves are approximately one year old and end with a calf show just before they are due to freshen.

Third or Cow Year: This period should start when the heifer freshens and continue for one year, or through the first lactation period, at which time a club show will be held.

Any boy or girl of club age who is interested in joining the calf club should get in touch at once with the club leader in your community or with the County Agent.

Don't worry; whatever it is, it won't be so bad in another hundred years.

Don't be pessimistic! Don't be optimistic! Now do you know what to be?

About the most useless waste of time that we know of is the meeting of the average committee.

Good pastures cheapen hog production. Alfalfa, clover, and rape are the leading hog pastures.

Frankly, Mr. Farmer, if we were in your place we wouldn't know what to plant, but we have an idea.

Whitewashed tree trunks and boulders on the lawn indicate an appreciation of order and neatness but a lack of good taste.

Fable: All the church people of St. Joe and Spencerville doing what the preacher tells them to do.

Arrange the hog pens, feeding troughs, and sleeping quarters so that pigs not on pasture will have to take some exercise. This will keep the breeding stock in good condition and promote good growth in pigs.

Invite Local Merchants to First Anniversary in Merchandise Mart

The New Way—Buys Everything in One Building

W. C. Owen, President
Mart Chamber of Commerce

140,000 Retailers and Buyers From 17 States
Asked to Visit Displays of 2,000 Manufacturers and Wholesalers at Spring Opening of Great Central Market in World's Biggest Building, Chicago, April 13-14.

LOCAL retail merchants here are included in the list of 140,000 retailers and buyers from seventeen states who have been invited to the first co-operative sale in the Chicago Merchandise Mart, the world's biggest building, since its opening a year ago, according to announcement reaching here from W. C. Owen, president of the Chicago Merchandise Mart Chamber of Commerce.

This first anniversary sale in this "Wholesale City Under One Roof" will be held April 13 and 14, and will display the merchandise of 2,000 manufacturers and wholesalers. The number of buyers asked to visit this spring opening may reach more than 200,000, as in the case of department stores the buyers in all the various departments are invited. All the manufacturers and wholesalers, according to Mr. Owen, will present some "special" at this market that in itself will be worth the trip to Chicago. It is estimated that there will be 10,000 tables of these "specials" of May and June merchandise.

The states from which this great army of retail merchants is expected are Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Ohio, Tennessee, Wisconsin and Kentucky. Retailers in other states will be welcomed.

The great advantages to the local merchant of this concentrated market, all under one roof, with 4,000,000 square feet of display space, are explained in a statement received from Claude A. Welles, general manager of the Mart.

Big Aid to Local Merchant.

"In this gigantic structure is a veritable city of wholesale firms," said Mr. Welles. "Under one roof more lines, more houses and more merchandise to select from are assembled than in any similar institution in the world. The Mart embodies the modern ideas of a concentrated market of bringing the merchant to the market instead of attempting to inadequately take the market to the merchant. The arrangement of the display floors has been worked out with the object of conserving the buyer's time and energy to the utmost, providing every necessary aid to expedite his examination of goods and for his convenience and comfort while in the market."

The local merchant is enabled by coming to this great central market under one roof to take advantage of these mammoth special sales of high grade merchandise, whereby he can take home to his local market the latest styles and designs of superior value and to give his customers the advantage of price and quality he is able to secure.

"By coming to the market the local merchant not only gets the most up-to-date merchandise as soon as it is on the market, but great price advantages."

Army of Buyers Coming.

"This occasion on the 13th and 14th of April will bring to Chicago the greatest army of retail merchants and buyers that ever visited a single market, and it will mark the first co-operative concentrated sale held in the Mart since the opening of the world's biggest building a year ago. The buyer can enter the Mart in the morning, attend to all his business and personal affairs without leaving the shelter of one roof until bedtime. He can do everything except sleep in the Mart. This is a Department Store for Stores."

"Each of the display floors has sales corridors 650 feet long, a display space of five acres on each floor, veritable business boulevards. This great space, a total of about 100 acres in the entire building, has made it possible to house the selling and display activities of many allied concerns on a single floor, with related groups on adjoining floors."

Among the lines which will be given special emphasis in this anniversary sale are infants' and children's wear, rugs and floor coverings, artware, gifts and novelties, house furnishings, drug store sundries, interior decorations, hardware, men's and boys' clothing, men's furnishings and hats, women's wear and practically all other lines carried by dry goods and department stores. Merchants and buyers in all these lines are expected, covering the territory from Pittsburgh to the Rocky Mountains.

Message for the Merchants.

Every facility for the convenience and entertainment of the visiting merchants and buyers has been arranged for by Joseph Weidenfeld, chairman of the Chamber of Commerce market committee. On the evening of April 13th, the opening day of the spring market, the merchants and buyers will be guests at a banquet held in the world's biggest restaurant in the Mart. An outstanding speaker of national repute will discuss business conditions and the outlook for 1931, giving the visitors a message to take home that will be to their material advantage.

Probably no building in the world has such facilities for receiving and shipping merchandise. The entire ground level, below the street floor is utilized as a modern freight station. Private tracks for incoming and outgoing freight extend under the center of the building. The Chicago & North Western Railroad operates the freight station which connects with all other roads through its new Provision Yard. The merchandise as it comes into this mammoth freight station is loaded into high speed conveyors and transported to the exact floor of the tenant for whom it is intended. A river dock for vessels connects with the south freight elevators of the building.

Week's Work in Two Days.

One of the great advantages for the buyer who does his trading in the Merchandise Mart is the fact that he does not have to tramp all over the city visiting various concerns in scattered sections. He saves time and energy by being able to do a week's work in two days under one roof, and this makes it possible to make more frequent trips to the central market at no greater total expense.

The Merchandise Mart is located in the center of the area which contains within a night's journey by rail and four hours by air, 47 per cent of the country's population, 70 per cent of its wholesale sales and 65 per cent of its retail outlets. According to the last distribution census there were 9,317 wholesale outlets in Chicago doing a total business of almost $5,000,000,000 a year—a turnover of merchandise at wholesale equaled by no other marketing center in the world.

Easy to Reach Market.

Chicago is within fifty miles of the nation's center of manufacturers, within 170 miles of the center of population of the United States, 270 miles from the center of agriculture and 580 miles east of the geographical center. Located as it is, so near to the center of population, the Merchandise Mart can be reached more quickly by the average buyer and merchant than from any other large city in the country.

For the retail merchants the Merchandise Mart means increased economy and efficiency in merchandise buying because of its logical location at the travel-traffic center of the nation. It places a great primary market many hours closer to the average merchant buyer.

The Mart is an important building because it represents a tangible solution of the economic needs of the day—concentration of buying and selling activities, conservation of energy, co-operation in industry, elimination of abuses and an improved code of ethics in trade.

It is the culmination of a century of merchandising in Chicago, which has made itself the great central market of the West, and represents the beginning of a new era in merchandising in which it will be as natural for the merchant to do his buying at a great central market as it now is for the consumer to visit a department store. It will make for better merchants and for higher standards of merchandising, for it will save for selling a considerable portion of the time the merchant has heretofore devoted to buying, and will ultimately benefit the consumer by cutting manufacturer's selling costs.

Give Buyers Every Facility.

For the service of the visiting buyer, nothing has been overlooked. The Mart houses the world's biggest restaurant that feeds 10,000 people a day. The buyer can go direct to the Mart from his train with his baggage. Here his hotel reservations will be taken care of, his baggage transported to his hotel and placed in his room. He will have the facilities of one of the biggest barber shops in the country, and complete valet service, a branch post office, telegraph office, public stenographers, drug store, candy and floral shops. In fact, every personal and business need is taken care of on the main floor of the building. In the tower is the world's biggest radio broadcasting studio, that of the National Broadcasting Company.

The second floor of the gigantic structure, which cost $35,000,000, is used in part for trade shows and exhibitions. The grand lobby, as one enters from the main entrance on the banks of the Chicago River, is beautified by nineteen striking murals representing the market places of the world. This panorama of the world's commerce and industry has been effected in a series of soft harmonizing pastel shades applied by the skilled palette knife of the noted artist, Jules Guerin.

FORMER ST. JOE GARAGE-MAN CAUGHT BOOTLEGGING

An early Sunday morning raid by local officers resulted in the confiscation of a large amount of liquor, an elaborate still and paraphernalia and the arrest of William Litzenberg, aged 30, residing five miles south and a mile west of Garrett.

Sheriff Hoff, Deputy Sheriff Grimm and Chief of Police Davis worked all night and Sunday morning at 5:30 an automobile truck load of liquor, material for making it and a complete distillery were hauled to the jail in Auburn to be used as evidence against the prisoner.

Litzenberg had been under suspicion for some time as a bootlegger. Saturday night about 9 o'clock he was taken in custody near the residence of Charles Poppele at 540 West Fifteenth Street in Auburn.

After lodging Litzenberg in the city lock-up the officers proceeded to investigate his activities and discovered that he had moved recently to a farm on the Thrush Road west of the filling station at the intersection of State Road 27 and the Thrush Road.

The officers routed Prosecuting Attorney Richard Sharpless and James Griffin, justice of the peace from their sleep, the affidavit and search warrant were prepared and the officers started for the home of the bootlegger.

In an upstairs room they found a still in operation. Taking an inventory of the layout the officers found 600 gallons of mash in twelve 50-gallon barrels, some liquor in kegs, glass containers and bottles. There was about twenty-two gallons of the stuff ready for the market.

The still was operated on a high pressure gasoline range. In the room was a large amount of raw product for the manufacture of the illicit booze. Hundred pound bags of cerelese, coloring, a thermometer and computer for testing, charcoal, kegs and bottles were found in the well equipped place which had the appearance of doing considerable business.

No one was at home at the time the officers arrived at the house at 2:30 Sunday morning. A large German police dog, a cat and a lot of baby chicks was the only life about the place. Mrs. Litzenberg had evidently left earlier in the evening. The officers think she either learned of the raid or was spending the night somewhere in Auburn.

At 5:30 the work of destruction of the outfit had been completed and the still and liquor were loaded on a truck after Sheriff Hoff had poured kerosene in the twelve barrels of mash.

When questioned Litzenberg said he lived on Rural Route 1 out of Butler, but the officers after making inquiry by telephone found that he had moved about two months ago on the farm said to be owned by Edward Kelham, south and west of Garrett.

Asked why he engaged in the manufacture of illicit liquor, Litzenberg answered that he "had to make a living somehow."

The outfit was one of the largest and most complete taken in DeKalb county and the liquor appeared to be better stuff than the average moonshine. It had a good color, it was clear and lacked the poison smell generally found in homemade booze.

Litzenberg entered a plea of guilty to illegal possession Monday morning in the DeKalb circuit court and the case was taken under advisement.

SALVATION ARMY OFFICIATES AT SERVICE

The Salvation Army, of Fort Wayne, Indiana were in town in force on last Sunday at the M. P. Church. The company, under the direction of Mrs. Johnson, who has charge of the Army at the present time in its industrial work, took entire charge of the program during the regular church hour, which demonstrated the real work of this organization and the whole hearted way in which its laborers go about their altruistic labors.

The program consisted of congregational singing, special numbers by their choir, testimonials, and a good sermon by the Commander of the Huntington Barracks. The service was as near being typical to their average service as possible, to demonstrate the difference between their method of presenting the gospel facts and the average pastoral church.

The Salvation Army has been termed, by all religious faiths, as a square shooting organization. Their record in the World War and the generations that they have served since Booth organized the Army, has proved to the world the sincerity of its membership and its right and authority to operate as a Christian organization.

The fact that its membership goes on the street in all kinds of weather to propagate the Christian religion, enduring the scoffs of the less reverent public, and exist on the voluntary contributions of society, goes far to disprove any contention that the organization is parading before the world for the honor of the leaves and fishes that are derived therefrom. The Salvation Army demonstrates the nearest approach to pure practical Christianity of any organization in Christendom.

There are few members of our established denominations that possess the spiritual cloiture to be able to go out on the street and take their place in line with the drum, the horn, and the sermon and stay with it. The world recognizes this as a fact and with it comes a "hats off" obeisance to the Army and the O. K. of Catholic, Protestant and Jew.

The Army voiced their appreciation of the support given by the churches of St. Joe in giving to them those things which could be used in helping the needy, by way of clothing, furniture, paper, rags and dishes. A good truck load was given.

A basket dinner was served at the church after the program.

STOLEN TOOLS RETURNED TO FLOYD BARKEY

Marion Halfey, of Harlan, who was arrested by Sheriff Fred G. Lunz on a charge of stealing tools valued at $80 from Floyd Barkey, of St. Joe, was freed after a hearing before Frank Miller, Springfield Township justice of the peace, Monday.

Halfey was released after he had been given a lecture by Justice Miller and the tools taken from Barkey had been returned. It was charged that Halfey took the tools when he was operating a garage for Barkey while the latter was ill.

LUTHERAN YOUNG PEOPLE ENTERTAINED

On April 30th at the Lutheran Church a six o'clock dinner was held in honor of the young people who were taken in church on Easter Sunday. This was given by the Tri-Mu class and the teacher, Mrs. Grace Dilley.

When the guests were seated at the table which represented a rainbow, Joe Woodcox took his place as toast master. The toasts were based on Noah's Ark. The first toast was on "The Building of the Ark," given by Martha Miller. Then a delightful dinner was enjoyed which consisted of, first course, meat loaf, scalloped potatoes, corn, pickles, jelly and rolls. At the end of the first course Lucille Curie gave a toast on "The Coming of the Storm."

The second course consisted of cake and peaches with whipped cream. After the second course Derwood Ridgway gave an interesting toast on "The Rainbow of Promise."

After dinner games were played and after every guest had their share of entertainment departed for their homes.

Those that joined the church were Josephine Bachtel, Ethel and Effie Freeburn, John Dilley, Floyd and Russell Pfauamer, Kenneth Ridgway, Ned Shull, Dale Collins, Curtis Northrup, Violet Baker, Virginia Shull, Jean Goodwin, Ruth and Mary Curie, June Ridgway and Enid Curie.

R. & O. OFFICER VISITS ST. JOE

J. H. Leahy, Deshler, Ohio, who is a member of the R. & O. Police Department, made his annual visit to St. Joe, Monday, in the interest of the Safety Department of the railroad. His particular concern is that children be not allowed to cross the tracks unattended or be allowed to play on or near them. Safety of the public in general is of much concern and every measure possible should be exercised when about or near their tracks.

GRABILL BANK BANDIT GETS TEMPORARY PAROLE

The parole board of the Indiana state prison has granted a temporary parole of 60 days to Arna Hutchens, who was given a 10 to 21 year sentence for robbery in the Allen circuit court September 21, 1923.

Hutchens was one of two bandits who held up Albert Egle, cashier of the Grabill State bank, on September 6, 1923, and took $778 in currency. He was charged with the crime in a grand jury indictment.

WIFE CHARGES HUSBAND BEAT HER

Fred Miller, of near Spencer, pleaded not guilty when he was arraigned in the DeKalb circuit court Monday on a charge of assault and battery.

Miller was arrested Sunday upon complaint of his wife, Ella Miller, who says he beat her, and the affidavit was prepared by Richard W. Sharpless, prosecuting attorney.

Miller's bond was fixed at $200, in default of which he was remanded to jail.

PIONEER RESIDENT DIES OF PARALYSIS

Mr. William Staman, 88, pioneer resident of Concord Township, passed away Tuesday evening of paralysis. He was stricken Friday morning and never regained consciousness.

While sitting at the kitchen cabinet, doing some figuring, Mr. Staman was stricken. Mrs. Staman had just gone to the other room to get a picture they had been taking about, and when she returned he was leaning over on the cabinet, and she thought then he was dead. She hurriedly laid him on the floor and called for help.

Mr. Staman was active until the end, barring only a few weeks when he was laid up with an injured leg.

Funeral arrangements are announced for Friday at 2 o'clock from the country home. Rev. A. K. Mumma, of Harlan, officiating. Burial in the K. of P. Cemetery.

COUNTY COMMENCEMENT PLANS ARE MADE

The annual commencement of the district schools of DeKalb County will be held in Auburn Wednesday, June 3.

Complete arrangements for the event were made at the monthly meeting of the township trustees in the office of County Superintendent Carl F. Stallman.

The speaker will be Rev. Arthur J. Folsom of Fort Wayne. Music will be furnished by the Butler Girls' Band. Diplomas will be presented to the graduates at the court house at 1 o'clock and they will then march to the alumni gymnasium. The number of graduates is only 143, as compared with 170 last year.

The trustees decided to open the 1931-32 school year on Tuesday, September 8, the day following Labor Day. The county teachers institute will be held the week of September 1. Mrs. Blanche Nugen of Jackson Township, was re-elected as county attendance officer for another year.

PORTO RICO'S PROBLEMS

A Porto Rican Field Laborer and His Humble Thatched Hut.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

PORTO RICO'S problems—problems that have flowed strangely enough in large part from improved sanitation and health and the consequent rapid increase in population—have come more plainly into the view of the American people as a result of President Hoover's trip to the island. The area of Porto Rico is only once and a half that of Delaware, but into its 3,435 square miles are crowded more than a million and a half people—nearly seven times the population of Delaware. This gives the island a population density of approximately 430 to the square mile.

With more laborers than there is work to be done, unemployment is a perennial evil, and a job is like an heirloom, to be handed down from generation to generation whenever possible.

Usually the plantation laborer and his entire family go barefoot because there are no funds with which to buy shoes. The young boys in the rural districts commonly run about with less than the proverbial fig leaf to clothe them and suffer not at all, thanks to the glorious climate.

Food, perforce, is both simple and scarce. Rice and beans, with a little bit of salt cod, appear on the table when the wage earners are employed; but these are imported and cost money, so they disappear when the job ends. Then bananas, sweet potatoes, and native vegetables raised on their small patches of ground must tide the families over until another period of employment begins.

The United States Department of Agriculture is trying to induce the natives to raise Belgian hares. The rapidity with which these animals breed, the quickness with which they attain maturity, and the ease with which their food requirements are met in a tropical environment make them poor man's cattle par excellence. Hare raising would solve the jibar's meat problem as perhaps no other industry could.

If one examines the census returns, the conclusion will likely be drawn that Porto Rico has a high percentage of home owners; but a very large proportion of these homes are merely thatched shacks costing, perhaps, $25 each.

Plantation owners are glad to have natives build the shacks on their estates, as a constant supply of cheap labor is thus provided. There are few mortgages as such buildings are not worth mortgaging.

The thatch, made of rough grass or palm leaves, is sometimes used for side-walls as well as for the roof, though more frequently the walls are made of royal-palm bark. Flattened tin cans and discarded corrugated metal sheets are also utilized.

Homemade Utensils. Dishes and utensils are largely homemade. Gourds and discarded tin cans are substituted for the pots and pans of continental kitchens. Hammocks and floor pallets take the place of beds and chairs.

The rural laboring native is known as "jibaro," which literally means "escape from civilization." Good natured, reconciled to a hard lot and a precarious existence, a mixture of Indian and Spaniard, he combines the care-free ideals of the redskin and the impetuous temperament of the Spaniard.

The jibaro inherits his name from the distant past. After Columbus discovered the island and Ponce de Leon awakened it, a gold fever brought many adventurers, who impressed the Indians into service. Those natives who could escape fled to the interior, away from their slave-driving masters.

Some of the pioneering Spaniards made homes for themselves with native women, by whom they had numerous children. These all too often were turned adrift.

Furthermore, in the past Spain sent to the island many petty offenders, who sooner or later were released to wander inland from the civilization that fringed the coast.

Out of diverse types and races has been bred the jibaro. He is no longer an "escapee from civilization," a benighted government is trying to do all it can to improve his lot, to carry to him whatever it can of the blessings of health, education and happiness.

One of the potent factors in the development of Porto Rico has been the constabulary system under American supervision.

The police force, which under the Spanish regime consisted of less than 300 officers and men, when the island was formally taken over by the United States, was replaced by military police under the command of General John R. Brooke.

In 1899 the present insular police of Porto Rico was organized with a force of six officers and 100 guardsmen. This was almost immediately increased to 10 officers and 355 guardsmen, with an officer of the United States army as inspector. Their work was confined to rural districts and towns of less than 6,000 inhabitants, with the municipal police guarding the larger cities.

Efficient Police.

In 1902 a law was enacted which entrusted the protection of the entire island to this organization. Seven police districts were established, each commanded by a captain, a lieutenant, and as many warrant officers as the chief might find necessary. The headquarters of the chief are at San Juan.

It is said that no state in the Union has a force that does the entire policing of the commonwealth—cities and rural districts alike—and Porto Rico has for the protection of her population of 1,544,000 less than 800 policemen, distributed over 75 districts.

The insular police roughly divide the masses in Porto Rico into four categories for identification—the urban dwellers who wear shoes, and three other groups that proclaim the regions from which they come by the shape of their bare feet.

The jibaro with a broad, flat foot can usually be designated as a worker in the cane lands along the coast. A native with short, stubby feet usually comes from the tobacco districts, where he uses them to plant his crop.

A man with overdeveloped great toes (helpful in climbing) probably comes from the hill country and the mountains, where the coffee plantations abound.

The professional mendicants of the island are a persistent band. With any sort of shack sufficing for shelter, with native fruits and vegetables available for food, with a very tolerant law and no suffering from the rigors of climate, the beggar has little to worry about.

Saturday is beggars' day, and stores, offices, and individuals lay in supplies of pennies. In the larger establishments a clerk is stationed near the door, and as the mendicants slip in he nonchalantly pushes several pennies to each. The coins are usually accepted without thanks and as a just due.

Liberal With Beggars.

Salesmen going their rounds usually carry a pocketful of pennies, as they make a better impression on customers if they are liberal with beggars.

As in most tropical countries, the hyperbole is a tremendously overworked figure of speech. Admire a native's horse, his saddle, his gun, his dog, his house, and he'll tell you in the most convincing tones that it is yours. But it is yours only after a manner of speaking.

Ask him why his people talk in such prodigious fashion and he will reply, "It is the custom," and custom is law to them.

Betting on horse races is almost a passion. Every bettor contributes to a pool and the person who picks the winner takes the money. In this way a dollar stands a chance of winning a thousand or more.

The average market place on Sunday is a riot of color and a beehive of animation. Afoot and on donkey-back, the peasant folk throng the roads, bringing flowers, vegetables and fruits on their heads and in panniers slung on burros or hauled in oxcarts.

The rural and village people have very simple amusements. The baptism of an infant is the occasion of a feast or a dance. From Christmas to Three Kings' Day, January 6, a succession of fiestas takes place. A pig roast, resembling the familiar barbecue of our southern states, is one of the culminating events of the native calendar.

On the eve of Three Kings' day, commemorating the bringing of gifts to the new born babe of Bethlehem, the children put bundles of grass under their beds or outside the house, so that the camels of the kings will stop at their homes when their masters are distributing gifts.

Star of My Life

When I breathed the breath of life,
Your prayers, like rays of heavenly light,
Illumed safe paths for me to tread,
To point my ways in places bright.
Through childhood days of helplessness
And mystery, strange pain and tears
You led me ever from the depths
Of joyless hours from needs or fears.

Star of my life—
My Mother.

New interests with added years
Have come but none that does imbue
With greater faith than your sure love,
No orb that gleams more brightly through
The clouds that float across my view
To peace and happiness and God.

To guide, to comfort, to sustain,
As life's uneven course I plod:
Star of my life—
My Mother.

I know 'tis not without distress
You've kept your light before my feet,
Of times I've followed errant bent
And brought you grief and sore defeat.
But your true life and patient love
Have e'er kept plain the surer way.

Though I fall short, you have not failed;
For this I honor you today:
Star of my life—
My Mother.

Day Held Sacred to Mother Love

Every year, on the second Sunday in May, we American people pay tribute to the mothers of the nation. On that Sunday we offer up prayers and give thanks for the sacrificing and self-denying love of all good mothers. We make formal recognition of maternity with its great love, born of God and less only than his great love for his children, that guards, protects and defends all children even at the greatest price, that of life itself. On this day we take time to show to our mothers by outward signs and visible tokens our appreciation of her watchful and loving care of us through all the years. For a little while we bring to view the treasures of memory buried deep in our hearts, Lucille Day writes, in the Indianapolis Star.

This beautiful custom is of comparatively recent origin although many profess to see its source in an old custom of the British Isles. There grew up the custom of the sons and daughters who were away from home going especially to the mother on the mid-Sunday of Lent. Usually they took with them some little trinket or gift as a token of their love. Doubtless, this custom soothed the heart of many a parent aching at the first flight of the boy or girl from the home nest. There, as the emphasis became placed more and more upon reverencing the mother, the mid-Sunday of Lent became known as Mothering Sunday.

Taken Up by Churches.

The United States observed no such day until the influence of a remarkable woman and her daughter became the heaven that finally brought about the universal and national observance of Mother's day. The first observance of a special church service honoring all mothers was so successful that ministers and governing bodies of churches of all denominations in all parts of the country began to urge the adoption and national observance of a universal Mother's day.

Since May 8, 1914, there has been national and governmental recognition of the second Sunday of May as Mother's day. On that day congress, by joint resolution, asked President Wilson to issue a proclamation designating the second Sunday of May as Mother's day. The President lost no time in complying with the request, signing the bill the same day and issuing the proclamation the next.

It is interesting to note that Woodrow Wilson deemed mothers worthy of the same recognition as the greatest of our national heroes. In his proclamation he directed the government officials to display the United States flag on all government buildings on this day and invited the people to display the flag at their homes or other suitable places as a public expression of love and reverence for the mothers of this country.

Special Church Program.

The observance of Mother's day is marked by deep spirituality in churches. Special programs are arranged at which mothers are guests of honor. Pastors preach appropriate sermons. The music is selected with reference to its suitability for the occasion. In some places each member of the congregation makes himself responsible for the attendance at the service of a mother, his or her own, if possible. A flower is pinned onto each mother present and often by her own child. A beautiful custom of some churches is the flower salute at the close of the service. At a given signal the flowers are held aloft while a benediction is pronounced upon all mothers.

The first call of the churches to observe Mother's day was directed particularly to the men and especially to "the wandering boy." Every man who was absent from his mother upon this day was urged to write his mother a letter some time on that day and, if dead, to wear a white carnation in her memory. At first a very determined effort was made to make the carnation the flower of the day. A red carnation was worn if the mother was alive and a white one if dead.

All Flowers Appropriate.

Florists have frowned heavily upon this idea and directed their energies against it. They say that carnations are really the favorite flowers of but few, that they can not afford to raise carnations in such large quantities to supply the demand of but a single day and if they would the price they would have to ask would be prohibitive to the average pocketbook.

The use of whatever flowers are blooming profusely at the time has become customary, usually peonies and roses. Potted plants as gifts of the day enjoy a huge popularity, being a source of longer enjoyment than cut flowers.

So the second Sunday of May has come to be a time of going home, of sending a telegram with love, of writing a letter, and of giving a gift to our best friend on earth, mother. But most of all, it means a stopping in the hurry and scurry of our modern life to take increased devotion to our mothers.

Ancient Burial Places Uncovered in Bavaria

A settlement dating from about 800 B. C. has been found near Osterhofen, Lower Bavaria. Excavations have turned up vessels of various kinds, urns, ceramics painted red, and a millstone. Cave dwellings from the Neolithic age were also found nearby. Near Darmstadt, not far from Erlangen, an urn burial place dating from the Late Bronze age is being uncovered. An accident has further led to the discovery of finds from the Roman period near Gunzburg on the Danube. Men digging a ditch came upon a Roman grave some five feet down, and a man's skeleton lay nearby. The finds include a bronze coin bearing the head of Vespasian with crown, and the inscription, "Imp. Caes. Vespasian, Aug. III."

Quick COMFORT for fretful upset children

ALL children are subject to little upsets. They come at unexpected times. They seem twice as serious in the dead of night. But there's one form of comfort on which a mother can always rely: good old Castoria. This pure vegetable preparation can't harm the tiniest infant. Yet mild as it is, it soothes a restless, fretful baby like nothing else. Its quick relief soon sees the youngster comfortable once more, back to sleep. Even an attack of colic, or diarrhea, yields to the soothing influence of Castoria.

Keep Castoria in mind, and keep a bottle in the house—always. Give it to any child whose tongue is coated, or whose breath is bad. Continue with Castoria until the child is grown!

It seems that an individual with any dry convictions could not sit on the jury in the Kirkland murder trial at Valparaiso. ## SET A DEFINITE GOAL FOR YOUR BABY CHICKS

(By Prof. W. B. Krueck)

The goal that every good poultryman should set before himself when starting baby chicks is good pullets that will start laying in the fall of the year.

The most important factor in deciding the cost of producing a dozen eggs is the efficiency of your hens, or in other words, the number of eggs laid per bird per year.

The number of eggs laid per bird each year is determined largely by the time that the pullets start laying in the fall. Practically all of our high producing hens in egg laying contests start laying in October or November.

Only by keeping your eye on the goal all the time can you be successful. Neglecting the pullets after the weather becomes warm, the egg prices relatively low, and poultry meat prices relatively low, has been the cause of producing many inefficient pullets on the average farm.

Thirty years ago very few farm flocks laid fall and winter eggs. Better feeding methods during the summer months, has enabled the farmer to produce eggs at the time of the year when they are highest on the market. Resorting to inefficient rations under present conditions is entirely wrong because pullets that will be produced under those conditions will be less efficient machines than the farmer has been producing and under present conditions it is necessary that production machinery be more efficient rather than less efficient.

Keep your eye on that goal—good pullets that will start laying in the fall of the year and every day let the ration and the management of those pullets work toward that goal.

THE PARABLE OF THE POUNDS

LESSON TEXT—Luke 19:11-26.
GOLDEN TEXT—Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be faithful.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Teaches Us to Do Our Best.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Teaches Us to Do Our Best.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Partners With Jesus.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Stewardship of Money.

The purpose of this parable was to correct the misapprehension of the disciples as to the immediate establishment of the kingdom. They were on the way to Jerusalem, and the disciples thought that immediately upon their arrival there Jesus would begin the exercise of his kingdom rule. Christ taught the disciples the reality of his coming and the setting up of a real kingdom, but indicated that there would be a long delay after his ascension before he would return.

I. The Absent Nobleman (v. 12).
Going away to receive a kingdom was a common occurrence among the Jews. Members of the Herodian family had gone to Rome and secured their appointment to rule over Palestine. This picture Jesus going back to God to receive his kingdom. Jesus ascended on high to receive from God the Father a kingdom. He will return when the fullness of the Gentiles be come in. Though the time of his return be unknown, and even delayed, let no one mistake the certainty of his coming.

II. The Distribution of the Pounds (v. 13).
These pounds represent Christ's gifts to his servants. When Christ ascended he gave gifts to men (Ephesians 4:7-12). To each servant was given the same amount, showing that to all a certain gift had been given and therefore all will be held responsible for its use. The distribution was made by the sovereign. The servants did not choose as to whether they would have a gift at all, or even its amount. It was also a purposeful distribution. They were to put their gifts to use during his absence. What the nobleman demanded was faithfulness.

III. The Rebellious Citizens (v. 14).
They hated him and sent messengers after him, notifying him of their refusal to be subject to him. This picture the unbelief of the Jews after Christ's ascension, and their repudiation of his rule. It also pictures the unbelieving world in its hatred and rejection of Christ.

IV. The Accountant (vv. 15-27).
1. Its certainty (v. 15).
Christ will surely bring every one to account for the use made of his gifts. Men may go on in proud unbelief and rebellion, but God never forgets. He has appointed a day in which he will judge the world (Acts 17:31).

2. The time (v. 15).
It will take place when Jesus comes back to the earth. His return will take place when he has received his kingdom. He will receive his kingdom when he asks the Father (Ps. 2:8). His delay in asking the Father for his kingdom is because of his long suffering mercy, extending grace to as many as will receive him as Savior.

3. Rewards given for faithfulness (vv. 16-19).
(1) The first report (vv. 16, 17).
He did not say, "I have made ten pounds," but "Thy pound hath gained ten pounds." He recognized the Lord's ownership. To this the Lord replied by commendation. He praised him and promoted him, making him ruler over ten cities.

(2) The second report (vv. 18, 19).
In this case the pound had gained five pounds. He did not get the Lord's commendation for he had not done so well, but was appointed to a place of rulership over five cities. The reward in each case was proportioned to faithfulness during the Lord's absence.

4. Judgment upon the unfaithful (vv. 20-27).
(1) His report (vv. 20, 21).
This report was entirely bad. He had not put the pound to use but laid it away, throwing the blame upon the Lord. He asserted that the character of the Lord was such as to produce fear.

(2) Condemnation (vv. 22, 23).
The wicked servant is judged out of his own mouth. His excuse increased his guilt. He is called wicked. To fail to use our opportunities to serve Christ is the basest wickedness.

(3) Stripped of the pound (vv. 24-26).
To fail to use one's gifts means to lose them. One of the losses of the next world will be the deprivation of what we now have.

Must Battle With Evil

Evil never surrenders its hold without a sore fight. We never pass into any spiritual inheritance through the delightful exercises of a picnic, but always through the grim contentions of the battlefield. Every faculty which wins its spiritual freedom does so at the price of blood.—J. H. Jowett.

Aids and Burdens

One staff aids a traveler, but a bundle of staves is a heavy burden.—Charles Haddon Spurgeon.

Holland's Changed Conditions

In the past 50 years a great change has taken place in Holland with respect to its agricultural status. Formerly it was an importer of dairy products, but a little more than a generation ago the farmers of that country became interested in modern machinery, the use of which became popular at once and the entire situation was changed so that at the present time the country takes care of its own consumption and in addition a great deal of this material is shipped abroad.

SEE HOW WHITE YOUR SHIRTS ARE, TOM, AND THEY WEREN'T SCRUBBED NOR BOILED

new soap saves
work and wear

"REMEMBER how quickly your shirts used to wear out? That's because they were scrubbed so hard. It wore me out, too! Now I don't scrub or boil—yet I get whiter washes than ever! My colored things come bright as new. For I've changed to Rinsol. It's a marvelous soap!"

Rich, safe suds
Thousands write to tell us how marvelous Rinsol is. Cup for cup, it gives twice as much suds as lightweight, puffed-up soaps—even in hardest water. Soapy, lasting suds that soak out dirt!

Great in washers, too; the makers of 40 famous washers recommend Rinsol. It's the finest cottons and linens. Nothing like it in rich suds for dishwashing. Get the BIG package.

MILLIONS USE RINSOL in tub, washer and dishpan

Fritz Kreisler tells an amusing story of a visit he paid when in London the other day. His hostess, after telling him that her little girl loved music and was learning the violin, sent for the child in order to introduce her to the great violinist. Kreisler, who adores children, was charming, and said: "I hear you are having violin lessons?" "Yes," was the answer, "and mother tells me you, too, play!"—London Evening Show.

Dragging Days

Restless Nights

Lack of pep is frequently caused by clogged-up systems. Feen-a-mint is thorough, dependable yet gentle in action. Effective in smaller doses because you chew it. Modern, scientific, safe, non-habit-forming.

CHAPTER XII

On the terrace, Robert MacBeth sat with Ray Brown. "Anything wrong with you, Ray?" he asked in his most fatherly manner. "You've been splendid and bucked me up tremendously, but I'm not a hog. Now that the girls have come, take an hour or so off, and leave the old man to his pipe and his book. You have earned a rest."

"Thanks very much for the leave of absence, Boss, but I'm not taking any. The only girl that I'd care to spend an hour or so with has just gone up the river road, hell-for-leather, with a strange young man."

"Well, take your car and go after her," advised Robert MacBeth, smiling. "Where's your adventurous spirit?"

Ray looked at him a little thoughtfully before he spoke. "It's Roberta," he said finally. "If Roberta showed you that she didn't want you hanging around, I don't think you'd run after her."

"No," her father answered thoughtfully. "I should say not." Then, after a little pause, he asked: "Who's the man with her?"

"I don't know," and in spite of himself Brown's voice sounded a little uneasy. He stole a side glance at his employer. "Another reason why I'm not following is that Sir George is chasing them, going for all he is worth, in my car."

Robert MacBeth laughed. "Took your car, did he? Well, who'd have thought it. I would have gambled on you as the first to follow."

Ray again regarded MacBeth solemnly. How much did the old man know, he wondered? Well, anyway, it was not his place to alarm or enlighten him. Roberta had made that plain to him a day or so ago. She had told him with the feeling that truth was the kindest thing, that she was not for him. But he must reassure the Boss. "I don't know. When it comes to being the actual, reckless Johnny-on-the-spot did you ever see the heat of Beauty Sanderson?"

Robert MacBeth nodded with enthusiasm. "It's the way with the old Scots stock. Can't turn them away, once they've made up their mind to anything. Roberta's been biting Sir George over the head every time his hat showed above the long grass. Yet see how he comes back." He paused abruptly and said abruptly: "Think I can leave him to handle it, Ray?"

Ray started. "Handle what?"

"The situation and the strange young man?" Robert MacBeth asked it a little anxiously.

"Oh, surely," Ray told him with more confidence than he felt. It looked to him very black that Roberta had gone off this way without consulting her father.

"Hello! Let me get you indoors, sir. It looks as though one of the best little thunderstorms in the history of the country was about to break."

The young people, driven indoors by the coming storm, at once missed Roberta and as promptly discovered that Sir George was also absent.

"Gone out with Sir George," Ray heard Robert MacBeth explain.

Lady Sanderson was still terrified by the sudden storm that swept devastatingly over the river and the island. "I do hope the lad will not get wet."

"How about Roberta?" one of the girls asked mischievously. "Aren't you anxious about her?"

"Not me. Miss Roberta knows how to look after herself."

But that was just what Roberta was discovering she did not know. With all her boasted independence she could have cried aloud for the safety of her father's house, as she sped up the river with Jack and without her bag. Jack had refused to wait until she went back for it.

"You have enough money, haven't you?" he asked. "We can buy what you need when we get to town. You ought not to have left the bag behind."

It was not very diplomatic, but he was tremendously irritated, and he had been so accustomed to laying down the law to elderly widows and spinsters, who admitted his masculine authority, that he forgot Roberta was not used to such a tone from him.

"You're not making yourself particularly agreeable," she told him shortly. "What's to hinder my getting out and going back if I want to?"

fashioned wooden covered bridge, one of the few left in the countryside. He also wondered if Roberta had any suspicion that he was following her. Sweat broke out on his brow as he thought of that possibility. An open and public clash between Roberta and himself was something he quite frankly dreaded, and yet if it must come it must. Of course, Jack must mean to marry her, he thought with a sick feeling of disgust. The idea of Roberta tied for life to that tricky mongrel was more than Sir George could bear.

Then the storm broke. The rain came down in torrents. Cars ran hastily into public garages and indeed into any kind of shelter they could get. Travel was impossible for most people, but he kept steadily on, though necessarily slowly. Just as he was thinking that now surely he would lose the blue car, he suddenly caught a glimpse of it in the procession ahead. It was making toward the covered bridge.

He lost the car again and edged his way gingerly out of the procession. He at once discovered why he had not seen it. Roberta and Jack were the center of an excited and jabbering crowd. Jack had crushed the mudguards of a dilapidated machine belonging to a family of voluble Polish-Americans out for their Sunday excursion. Jack was hurriedly taking their names and addresses and giving them his own. From the expression on Roberta's face Sir George guessed whether the name Jack had just given was the one with which Roberta was familiar.

They were so deeply engrossed in the accident that no one paid any attention to him, as he worked his way around on the outside of the group and made for the covered bridge. He did not go at once to the bridge entrance. He drew up where he could watch the crowd about Jack, without attracting Jack's attention.

The storm raged. Fortunately Ray Brown's car was not an open car and, in comparative comfort, Sir George seated himself and lit a cigarette, waiting for the moment when Jack would move. At present he felt he could do nothing that would make Roberta's escapade public property. Jack's temper was growing edgy, he could tell by his insolent attitude and his snarling voice, which occasionally carried above the roar of the storm.

The rain saved him, for the Polish-Americans hastily piled into their car, and the spectators scattered to seek shelter. Suddenly Jack's car shot past Sir George. It was raining too hard to go at that rate of speed, he decided, anywhere except on the covered bridge. Evidently Jack had this idea, too, for he swung around, narrowly missing Sir George. Jack was paying no heed whatever to the bridge rules and regulations, which called for a speed of only ten miles an hour. Jack's infringement of the rules annoyed Sir George, who had planned to stop him in the middle of the bridge and have it out in comparative seclusion.

Roberta was having her first active misgivings. Surely Jack had conducted the negotiations with the owner of the dilapidated car in an unnecessarily harsh manner. She simply could not imagine her father, or even, arrogant Sir George, speaking to those people in the way Jack had spoken, or giving them his name in such a fashion as to make it almost impossible for them to get it correctly. Then his sudden and abrupt way of giving in to all they asked, with a snarl and dash, away. She had not time to wonder any more, for she caught a glimpse of Sir George as she looked back.

"Jack!" she screamed out, so that he might hear her above the roar of the thunder, the reverberation of their swift progress along the loosely fitted boards of the old bridge, the rain and the roar of the wind. "What earthly right had he to follow?"

It was a simply disgusting oath Roberta told herself. She might be too modern to be shocked at a little profanity, but he simply should not say such things. She would see that he never said that again. But Sir George! What earthly right had he to follow?

Sir George, only too anxious to answer that question, was following as closely behind them as Jack's speed permitted. The old bridge, one of the few ancient wooden covered bridges left thereabouts, was a long bridge, crossing the river at its widest. The quaint wagon-shedlike structure had windows at equal distances all the way across. These old covered bridges were delightful places in which to cool off in summer time, with their narrow windows showing every now and then the beautiful river and the equally beautiful bridge. In a rain such as today's the bridge was a long, dim, dark tunnel, lit by occasional flashes of lightning. The noise of the rain on the wooden roof was terrific. Sir George, with a sinking heart, remembered his small supply of petrol as he increased his speed slightly so that he might not lose sight of Jack. He would save for the last spurt and stop Jack at the other side of the bridge just before he reached the highway.

Jack's plan was, of course, directly opposite. He meant to drive beyond the required regulations while he was on the bridge, and when he reached the entrance he intended to go flying at top speed up the hill to the New York road. He had forgotten, when his pursuer suddenly remembered with a relieved sigh, that there was a toll gate and a toll man at the other end of the bridge, and there the cars would have to stop while toll was paid.

Sir George, remembering this, relaxed. He could surely stop them at the gate, for Roberta would hardly care to stage a public scene. She might even be glad to come back with him. If she was not then it was a relief to Sir George rather hoped Roberta would not want to come with him at once, so that he might have that excuse to give Jack the beating that he richly deserved.

Then it happened. Suddenly, as it seemed instantly, after a long and terrible peal of thunder came a tremendous blinding flash and a sound as though something had been ripped. A rolling ball of fire flew before his eyes, a queer sulphurous smell filled the air and immediately, it seemed to him, the bridge between his car and Jack's burst into flames. It was Sir George's car, some distance behind Jack's, stopped, then went forward as flame and smoke rolled up. He felt a moment of horror. Roberta! Was Roberta hurt? Forgetting his own peril, for the flames were running along the roof and sides of the bridge and would soon reach him, he called aloud in his terrible anxiety and fear, as he drove forward. He did not realize that he was using the pet name the girl's father had given her and that he secretly thought charmingly fitted her boyish red-gold head.

"Bobbie! Bobbie! Bobbie! You're all right!" He continued to shout as he leaped from his car and ran toward the fire which was now like a flaming screen between them. "Bobbie! Bobbie! Where are you?"

Beyond the smoke and flames, after her first swift collapse against the shaking Jack, Roberta MacBeth lifted her head and listened. The shock had stunned them both and automatically Jack had stopped the car. What she heard made her turn to the flaming part of the bridge just behind them. Jack stretched out his hand to start the car again.

Again that agonized shout. This time it was plain to Roberta and Jack, too. "Bobbie! Bobbie! Wait! I'm coming."

Jack grinned an ugly grin. "He'll never get his car through that," he said, with a frightened look behind him.

But Roberta's hand was on his arm. "Don't stop, Jack," she begged. "Wait until he comes."

"Like hell! Let that Englishman gun things up? You're crazy." He put his foot on the self starter. Roberta promptly struck him across the face and pulled on the emergency brake. Before Jack could recover himself she was out of the car and running toward the fire. Through it, staggering, she could see a tall form.

Iceland Althipg First of World Parliaments

Iceland in June, 1930, celebrated two great events: the one hundred nineteenth birthday of Jon Sigurdson, its George Washington, who wrung home rule from Denmark in 1874; the thousandth anniversary of the althing, oldest parliament in the world.

A century before the battle of Hastings, 850 years before our own government was founded, the frankins (free landowners) of Ireland were living under a constitution (the constitution of Ulster) and a regularly constituted lawmaking body. The althing met in midsummer and was the occasion for great feasts and merry-making, as well as numerous bruises, incursions and concussions.

What political life and law were like in the old days is recorded in Iceland sagas and law codes. The althing did not function perfectly, nor did the judicial system which was set up, the real governing being done by various chieftains; nevertheless, the althing forms a magnificent tradition. It looks down from its hoary eminence with paternal solicitude for such youthful bodies as the English house of commons and the United States congress.

Great Men Slave Owners Both George Washington and Thomas Jefferson owned slaves and both in their wills left provision for their freedom and for their care and maintenance where they were unable to take advantage of their freedom, also provision for such as were too old to be turned at large.

JOY FOR THE BOB WHITES

Thrice blessed be the girl or boy Who fills another's heart with joy.

BOB WHITE flew back to the Green Meadows where little Mrs. Bob was anxiously waiting for him, and his heart was light. Mrs. Bob was watching for him and flew to meet him.

"It's all right," cried Bob. "I found him over in Farmer Brown's henyard." Of course "him" meant the young Bob White who had been given up as killed.

"What?" exclaimed Mrs. Bob. "He is a henyard, and what is he doing there?"

"A henyard is a place where Farmer Brown keeps a lot of big, foolish birds," explained Bob, "and little Bob is a prisoner there."

"How dreadful!" cried Mrs. Bob. "If he's a prisoner how can you say it's all right?"

"Because it is," replied Bob. "He's perfectly safe there, and he wouldn't be if he were here with us. You see, he can't fly. One of his wings was broken by the shot from that terrible gun. Farmer Brown's boy found him and has been very kind to him. He fixed that wing so that I believe it is going to get quite as well as ever. You know quite as well as I do how much chance little Bob would have had over here with a broken wing. Teddy Fox, or Red-tail the Hawk, or some one else would have been sure to get him sooner or later. But up there they can't because he is a wire pen. He can't get out, but neither can they get in, and so he is safe. He and Farmer Brown's boy are great friends. With my own eyes I saw him feed from the hand of Farmer Brown's boy. Do you know, I believe that boy is really and truly our friend and can be trusted?"

Then one morning a wonderful thing happened. Farmer Brown's boy came out and took young Bob out of his pen in the henyard. Young Bob looked quite himself by this time, for the strips of cloth which had bound his broken wing in place had been taken off and his wing was as good as ever. Farmer Brown's boy took him outside the henyard and gently put him down on the ground.

"There you are! Now go and join your family and in the future keep out of the way of hunters," said he, and laughed to see young Bob scamper over to join his brothers and sisters.

Such a fuss as they made over him! Suddenly Bob White flew up to the top of a post, threw back his head and whistled with all his might, "Bob White! Bob White! Bob White!" You see, he just had to tell all the great world of the joy in his heart. After that the Bob Whites flew back to the Green Meadows, young Bob with them, and all day long they whistled from sheer happiness.

And this is how it happened that Bob White and his whole family came regularly to Farmer Brown's for their breakfast and no hunter ever had another chance to carry fright, and suffering, and sorrow into their midst.

And when he'll be married to me.

This invocation should be repeated while holding some article in the hand—a handkerchief, any article will do—and the article so held should be placed under the maiden's pillow when she goes to bed. Then will she see in a dream her future husband. This is, of course, merely a survival of moon worship; an appeal to the goddess when she is represented in her most potent, or at least most popular, form as a crescent in the sky. The mystic beams of the crescent-moon falling upon the article held in the hand of her worshiper impart to it some of the magic power of the goddess—the article is, as it were, an offering made to the moon-goddess, touched by her rays and thus accepted. The offering thus "charged" by the essence of the divinity naturally retains, during the night, under the maiden's pillow, that property which supplies a direct connection between the moon-goddess and the maiden. The line of sympathy, by the magic of contact, is complete and the goddess, harkening to the prayer of her votary, showed her in a dream the future husband. Did not Selene glide down her silver beams to kiss the sleeping Endymion on the slopes of Latmos? Why not to bestow a vision upon a maiden votary in any part of the country.

Lotti Loder

The petite, vivacious beauty of Lotti Loder and her gay mannerisms attracted the attention of a small theater owner, and in 1927 Lotti made her stage debut, singing and dancing in an act. Her success was immediate. Her first experience was in vaudeville in middle Europe, doing impersonations. She was discovered by a prominent motion picture producer and was induced to come to this country, and soon was in Hollywood. Lotti was born in Vienna. She is ambitious and is on a fair way to realize her desire in the talkies.

For Meditation

By LEONARD A. BARRETT

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES

IT IS interesting to note the large amount of space given to editorials in leading newspapers regarding the associate justice of the Supreme court, Oliver Wendell Holmes, who celebrated his nineteenth birthday on March 8.

Commendation and praise together with hearty congratulations were the unanimous greetings of all who ventured to express an opinion publicly.

It is a wonderful thing to grow old grandly, but even more wonderful to be blessed with such health and strength as to enable one to continue active in his chosen field of labor in spite of the years.

One of the most interesting facts about Justice Holmes' experience in the Supreme court is that through having long passed the age of voluntary retirement, he chooses to continue to bear his full charge of responsibility as a member of that court. Most men would be glad for the opportunity to retire on a comfortable allowance for the remainder of their days; but not so, Justice Holmes. Commenting upon this fact, he was quoted as having said: "If I should retire I would die, and I do not want to do that."

Another interesting thing is that in spite of advanced years, Justice Holmes in mind and heart is still very young. Most persons having passed three score years and ten live in the past and manifest little or no interest in more modern ideas. Justice Holmes having arrived at four score years and ten is so modern in his thinking and interpretations that he's referred to by many writers as a radical. One writer in particular spoke of him as "Our Great American Liberal." His brilliant court decisions, many of which expressed most modern interpretations and were in many cases on the minority side of the court, have become classics in legal literature.

Justice Holmes refuses to admit failure. His persistency and capacity for hard work as well as his splendid character have endeared him to all his countrymen. Last but not means least, Justice Holmes is a great patriot. As defender of his country he not only served for 29 years on the Supreme bench, but in the early days served a most honorable career in the Civil war, receiving three bullets in that conflict which he still carries in his body.

A noble patriot; a brilliant jurist; a great American.

MOTHER'S DAY
MAY 10, 1931

Mother's Day this year falls on May 10, the second Sunday of the month, according to the annual custom started by Anna Jarvis of Philadelphia a number of years ago. It is a day that is set aside for special observance in nearly every church in the United States.

Whether your mother is still with you or has gone to her eternal rest, you owe her a debt of gratitude that you can never finish paying.

Mother's Day is set aside as the one day of the year when all right-thinking men and women let their thoughts dwell upon the undying devotion their mothers gave and the innumerable sacrifices they made for them. They thank God, every one of them, that He gave them a good mother and they find that the best place to show their appreciation is at the church—where she would want them to be on this Sunday.

Remember your mother especially on this day, send her a remembrance if you can, wear a carnation for her—and come to church and thank God for the noble woman He gave to be your mother.

If I could concentrate all the fragrance of the world into one flower I would call it a rose.
If I could concentrate all the melody of the universe into one composition, I would call it the Messiah.

If I could concentrate all the tenderness and sympathy of the world into one endearing term, I would call it Mother.

We will have special services appropriate for Mother's Day at Spencerville and Sulpio Churches. Won't you come for Mother's sake?

Rev. Homer Studabaker.

The Tulsa, Texas, Herald of April 9, took exception to a legislative measure proposed in that state to permit the state prison plant to file bids for state printing contracts, thereby permitting a tax-created and tax-maintained institution to compete with taxpayers. "Private enterprises possibly would not have invested millions and millions of dollars in Texas printing industries had they any reason to expect that the state would use tax dollars to establish competitive printing plants, manned by men who would receive little or nothing for their services. Private enterprises must pay printers and pressmen rather high wages for their services and the private concerns could not hope to compete with the prison plants, as any fair-minded person can see."

ALUMNI RECEPTION WAS CLIMAX OF GRADUATION

Amid a severe rain storm Saturday evening, the Alumni banquet was attended by 108 of the school's graduates and guests, including the class of 1931, composed of thirteen young people.

The Donald Kinsey orchestra opened the program with three numbers, and their music was much appreciated as evidenced by the hearty applause. They presented an unusual good appearance by the stage and fool light arrangements.

Thelma Curie, president, gave a welcome that was real. Expressing a kindly feeling to the former Alumni and challenging the class to new responsibilities in the carrying on the association.

Basil Sheffer, responded by accepting the challenge and expressing the eagerness of the graduates to assume their share in the carrying on of the Alumni association.

Mrs. Emily White Hull, Hicksville, appeared on the program, accompanied by Mrs. Greer at the piano. This part of the program was composed of songs, readings and musical cantillations. This feature of outside talent for a program of this character was a new departure, and one that met with the hearty applause of the audience. Mrs. Hull is an artist in her line of entertaining.

"A Call to Colors" was an original diversion from receiving classes in former years, and the obligation taken by the class was indeed binding upon them for future service. It was a surprise to the class as well as the audience. The members having charge of this feature were Janice Ridgway, Thelma Curie, Edna Perkins and Esther Bowman.

The singing of the Alumni Ode, written by Earl Shearer, completed the program.

The menu served in two course style was, first course, Ham au Gratin, Herlequin salad, potato chips, hot rolls. Second course: Pinapple Marquise, cake, coffee, mints.

TOLEDO PISTOL TEAM WINS BY ONE POINT

Possibly the first real pistol match ever held in St. Joe, was that of last Sunday when Warsaw, Fort Wayne, and Toledo came here for a match and also to visit friends.

Toledo's Crack Camp Perry Team beat Indiana's Warsaw Pistol Team by one point margin, and Fort Wayne Rifle Club by 23 points.

The course was fired:
10 shots—rapid fire at 50 feet.
10 shots—slow fire at 25 yards.

10 shots—in 15 seconds at 25 yards.
Revolvers used were 38 or 45 calibre.

Three former Indiana Champions shot on the teams representing Indiana. It was indeed a disappointment that Capt. Spike Hennessey did not shoot on Toledo's Team. He acted as team captain or coach for the Toledo Police.

Mrs. N. Ridlen shot the course as well as Mrs. J. F. Houck, doing a very nice job with the 45 calibre automatic.

The match was held on the Kees farm at the gravel pit through the courtesy of Mr. Kees. A large crowd attended. Other matches are planned and St. Joe should be pleased in having such outstanding Pistol Shots use our little city for its matches.

A DeKalb County Team will be entered in the next competition which will be held in the near future.

The Toledo Team with Captain Hennessey, his wife and son, Charles and Mrs. Larson were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. L. D. Young for lunch. Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Riethmiller, Mr. and Mrs.

RAILWAY EXPRESS MAY OPEN OFFICE

Mr. L. E. Beiter, route agent for the Railway Express Agency was in town Tuesday, looking over the express situation for St. Joe and community, and calling on the business men, to ascertain the need for such a service.

He was given a very friendly hearing by all and things look now as though local express service will be established over the Wabash railroad.

The establishing of this service here will not entail additional expense other than supplies for the office, as the agent is on a commission basis and the more express he can get his way, the more salary.

SHERIFF HOFF CALLED HERE WEDNESDAY

Upon complaint of citizens Marshal Perry called Sheriff Hoff to come and round up a queer acting fellow who frightened the women folks at the I. M. Woodcox home, Wednesday afternoon. By the time the officer arrived no trace of him could be found, although the fellow started west on the B. & O., after the marshal talked to him, and he promised to leave town. In the evening the fellow showed up at the Walter Stewart home and Sheriff Hoff was again called and took charge of him.

The fellow showed signs of being demented.

DEKALB - STEUBEN COUNTY DAIRY HERD IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION MEETS

The DeKalb-Stauben County Dairy Herd Improvement Association held an organization meeting Thursday evening, May 14th, in the town hall at Ashley. There were seventeen present. Mrs. E. E. Steele were elected directors. Mr. Fred Dixon, the present tester was employed for another year.

Mr. G. A. Williams, Extension Dairyman, gave a short but interesting talk. He stated that never was there a time when it was so necessary for a dairyman to know that his cows were doing and practically the only way he had of finding out was by testing. By doing so he could eliminate the boarders and reduce the cost of production. He also said that generally any cow that produced less than 300 pounds of butterfat per year was not paying her way.

There are at present eighteen members signed up for the coming year and it is expected that six more will signify their intentions of joining within the next week.

Chicken Chop Suey Is a Welcome Dish

Chicken Chop Suey Is Quite Delicious.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

Perhaps you have always thought of chop suey as a dish that is too unusual and foreign to prepare at home. As a matter of fact, chop suey is unknown in China; it originated in Chinatown in San Francisco, in an attempt to give visitors something out of the ordinary. It is made with such Chinese ingredients as water nuts, bamboo shoots, bean sprouts, soy sauce and often dried mushrooms, as well as chicken or pork, but a very good dish closely resembling the original chop suey in flavor may be made with vegetables that are common in most American localities. Soy sauce is sold in a great many groceries, and the chop suey will be almost perfect in flavor if you can get it. If not, Worcestershire sauce will do. Soy sauce contains a good deal of salt, so the amount of salt needed in your chop suey will depend on which kind of sauce you have.

Why not invite your friends or family to try a Chinese supper some evening? If you have any Chinese accessories or decorations, so much the better. At least, you can make chicken chop suey and rice the main attraction, with preserved ginger for dessert. The Chinese do not use bread and butter, because they have the rice, but you may serve it if your family prefers. The vegetables on which we depend for vitamins are incorporated in the chop suey-onions and celery. The recipe below is from the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture.

1 fowl, weighing 3 to 4 lbs.
2 cups of shredded onions.
2 cups of shredded celery.
1 green pepper, shredded.
3 cups of chicken broth.
1 tsp. cornstarch.
2 cups sliced Bratons or Jerusalem artichokes.
4 tbs. soy sauce.
2 tbs. fat.
1 1/2 tsp. salt, depending on the amount of salt in sauce.
1 tbs. cold water.

Put the fowl on a rack in a kettle, half fill with boiling water, cover tightly, and simmer until the meat is nearly tender. Let cool in the broth, remove the meat from the bones, dis-

Hints for Housekeepers

Dried fruits are some of the best confections for the children because the sweet is less concentrated.

Prevent rusting in the oven by leaving the oven door ajar for an hour after baking to allow any moisture to vaporize.

Pastry improves by chilling, so after the dough is mixed, wrap it in waxed paper and keep it in the refrigerator a few hours.

Mattresses will last longer and be more comfortable if they are turned frequently, sunned and cleaned with a brush or vacuum cleaner brush attachment.

Good Things for the Family Table

By NELLIE MAXWELL

"Suppose that this here vessel," says the skipper with a groan, "Should lose her bawlin', run away and bump upon a stone." "Suppose she'd shiver and go down when I save ourselves we couldn't!" The mate replies, "Oh, blow me eyes!" "Suppose, again, she shouldn't!" —Wallace Irwin.

There is no dinner dish that is more popular, if we except chicken, than Baked Ham.

Soak a ham over night. In the morning put it into a kettle with one onion, one carrot, six peppercorns, one bay leaf, six cloves and water to cover. Simmer for three or four hours until tender. Remove the skin and stick with whole cloves; bake in a roasting pan, basting with the ham liquid and cider, using half of each. When the ham is well done stir some brown sugar into the cider sauce and spread all over the ham and brown. Serve hot with the liquor from the pan for sauce.

Deviled Lobster.—Cook three table-spoonsful of onion, one table-spoonful of green pepper, three table-spoonsful of butter very slowly until tender. Add one and one-half cups of lobster meat and sprinkle with two table-spoonsful of flour, one table-spoonful each of mustard, salt and paprika to taste, with a table-spoonful of Worcestershire sauce and a cupful of cream. Cook a minute or two. Place in ramekins or shells and bake well covered with buttered crumbs.

Fig Cake.—Beat three egg whites with one-half cupful of sugar and add a table-spoonful of vanilla. Beat three egg yolks with one-half cupful of sugar, the grated rind of an orange, a table-spoonful of baking powder sifted twice with a cupful of flour, add three table-spoonsful of orange juice and fold in the egg mixture. Melt four table-spoonsful of butter in a cakepan, add one-half cupful of brown sugar, one cupful of chopped figs and a sprinkling of broken pecans. Pour over this the cake mixture and bake 20 minutes in a moderate oven. When done turn upside down and serve with whipped cream. Stewed apricots, canned pineapple or any fruit desired may be used for this delicious cake dessert.

Deviled Chicken.—Prepare a sauce of salt, pepper, dry mustard, paprika, grated lemon peel, lemon juice, Worcestershire sauce and a few drops of tabasco sauce. Add a lump of butter when the sauce is at the boiling point. Now add cubes of cooked chicken and serve when well heated through.

season well with salt, pepper and onion juice, with a grating of nutmeg and a little lemon juice. Cook over coals or under gas from eight to ten minutes. Serve with creamed butter and paprika spread over each steak. Parsley may be used if preferred. A very hot frying pan if lightly greased may be used instead of the broiler.

Stuffed Dill Pickles.—Take two large dill pickles and core the long way with an apple corer. Fill the centers with seasoned cheese and chili. Serve cut into thin slices and use them as a garnish for a canape. To cream butter easily scald the bowl before using.

Vegetable Stew Makes Complete Meal

A substantial stew made of several different vegetables is liked for change once in a while. When it is served on toast it is almost a meal in itself. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture recommends the method of make it described below. The children will enjoy a savory vegetable stew for a mid-day lunch, and it will be good for them.

2 cups diced rutabaga
1 small onion
2 cups diced potato
1/2 tsp. sage
2 cups hot water
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper

Fry the diced salt pork until crisp. Remove the pork and some of the fat from the skillet and brown the onion and rutabaga in the remaining fat. Add the potato, salt, sage, and water. Cover and simmer until the rutabaga is tender. Remove the cover and cook until the stew has thickened somewhat. Add the browned salt pork, pepper, and more salt if needed. Serve with crisp toast.

Gingersnaps That Will Retain Crispness

If the family likes ginger snaps you can make them sometimes at home by the recipe below, from the bureau of home economics. These ginger snaps should be kept in a tightly closed tin to retain their crispness.

1 cup molasses.
1/2 cup butter or 2 tbs. sugar.
1 to 2 tbs. ginger.
3/4 cup sifted flour.
1 1/2 tsp. salt.

Heat the molasses to the boiling point, and pour it over the fat. Dissolve the soda in a table-spoonful of water. Add this and the sifted dry ingredients to the molasses and fat. Mix well and make into a long roll as large around as the cookies are to be. Wrap this roll of dough in waxed paper and put in a cold place to chill for several hours or overnight. The dough must be cold through and through to cut properly. When ready to bake, cut the roll into very thin slices with a sharp knife and bake in a moderate oven (350 degrees Fahrenheit) until lightly browned. Remove from the pan while hot.

Doughnuts and Refreshments Popular

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

Good tender doughnuts, freshly made, are useful for innumerable occasions where simple refreshments are called for. At church societies and other community gatherings something inexpensive but popular is usually served, and doughnuts, with a beverage of some sort, answer this need admirably. When a chance caller comes during the late afternoon, doughnuts with coffee are most appreciated. After the evening "four some" at cards, doughnuts and a fruit drink are appropriate.

The United States Department of Agriculture gives the recipe below for doughnuts. The ingredients given make about 40.

Doughnuts.
1 cup milk.
1/2 cup sifted soft-wheat flour.
2 tsp. fat.
2 eggs.
5 tsp. baking powder.
1 cup sugar.
2 tsp. salt.
1/2 tsp. cinnamon.
1/2 tsp. nutmeg.

Place the fat in a warm place until it becomes soft, though not melted. Combine with the sugar. Stir in the beaten egg yolks, and add alternately the dry ingredients, which have been sifted together, and the milk. Add around, and down behind a fern was the missing basket with the strawberries.

Then the Giant and all the squirrels set to work and gathered many wild strawberries so that Mahalia's basket was filled when she left them.

She loved wild strawberries almost better than any fruit and she was very happy about having such a lot of them.

The giant was happy because he had proved to one more little girl that a giant could be a dear, friendly soul, and the squirrels were happy that they had been the ones to bring all this about.

So you see, although the story began with tears of self-expression, You can't slam a revolving door.—Kansas Gazette.

only a small quantity of liquid at the start. And the flavoring and fold in the well-beaten egg whites last. Roll out the dough about one-third inch thick without handling it any more than necessary. Cut out the doughnuts and fry in deep fat, hot enough (375 degrees Fahrenheit), to make a doughnut rise to the surface quickly and to brown each side in about one minute. Drain on brown paper. When dry, they may be rolled in sugar.

One of the secrets of success in making doughnuts is the use of a plain mixture such as the above. A rich dough tends to absorb too much fat Tender Doughnuts, Freshly Made.

In frying, the dough should be rolled smooth and not too thick, for a rough surface absorbs more fat, and a thick doughnut does not cook entirely through in the short frying period. If the fat is not hot enough the doughnuts will be greasy. Doughnuts can be forced under the fat to make them brown evenly and quickly by pushing a wire frying basket down on them.

Man's Standby Doomed
Revolving doors for homes are now suggested. Here goes down-trodden man's last mode of self-expression. You can't slam a revolving door.—Kansas Gazette.

Graduates Choose Sheer Frocks

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

As to the matter of being prettily and modestly frocked, fashion has some extremely interesting information to impart to the "sweet girl graduate" to be. The important message has to do with the high style value placed on fine sheer cottons.

It is smart to wear frocks of the ingenious type which charm because of their apparent simplicity no matter how sophisticated, in reality, that simple, pretty may be. And so the style-wise graduate will be receiving her diploma gown in quaint dotted swiss of crisp organdie or fine embroidered batiste this season.

Organdie is a favorite with designers, especially the new embroidered organdies which to see is to covet. For the graduating frock we can think of nothing prettier than white, or if preferred, flesh-colored, all-over embroidered organdie. Of course it must have a full neckline with fitted neckline, however, for that is the "trick" in dressmaking this season, to accent a slender silhouette with a sprightly flare commencing above the knees. The normal waistline of this youthful gown will be defined with a girlish sash. The sleeves will be either little puffs or perhaps a ruffle or two or suggested by a bertha or capelet.

Later this charming dress will go dancing in the moonlight or, topped with a wide-brimmed sunnery hat, it will appear at garden parties.

It is rather difficult for the girl selecting material for her graduating frock to choose between embroidered and plain organdie which is lace-trimmed, the latter to be worn over a taffeta slip. Clever things are being done with lace and organdie, one of which is posing the crisp transparent yveave over a lace foundation slip. The graduating frock being white, would be mounted over white lace, but for the party dress the organdie is apt to be any lovely tint and the lace underneath should be a perfect match.

The attractive organdie gown pictured has a simplicity about it which, tunes in charmingly to the graduating scene. This dainty dress features bands of lace artfully inset so as to form a front panel in the skirt, the double cape repeating this trimming.

Story for the Children at Bedtime

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

"What in the world is the trouble?" asked a squirrel with a bushy tail, who happened to be near a place in the woods where he saw a little girl was crying.

"My name is Mahalia," said the little girl, "and I've lost my—oh, oh, oh, I've lost my—then she sobbed and sobbed and couldn't say another word.

Pretty soon one of them said: "Let's ask our old friend, Mr. Giant, to suggest some way of stopping Mahalia from crying."

"Oh," said Mahalia between her sobs, "he may eat me up and stop my crying that way. But I've lost—" and then she burst out crying again.

"Dear me, no," said the squirrel, who had suggested the giant. "He is the kindest giant you can imagine."

All the other squirrels who had come around, too, to see what was the trouble, said:

"Bushy Squirrel is perfectly right. What he says is so. The Giant is very kind."

"Yes," continued the first squirrel who had spoken to her, or Bushy Squirrel, as he was called. "He is our best friend. He lives in a cave just a little way off, and whenever we go to call on him he gives us nuts to eat and sends home nuts to our mothers and fathers.

"He tells us wonderful stories of his adventures. He's as big as the cave but he can curl up just inside where none of the real people will bother him.

"He's afraid if he came forth they'd put him in a circus—and he does love the woods so much."

"Why," he says," continued the squirrel, rel, "that when the circus comes to the town nearby, the only thing he misses about it is the peanuts, and he wishes for them so we can have them."

"That is how kind he is. He's always thinking of others."

Mahalia had stopped crying and had decided the giant must be indeed very wonderful if the squirrels were so fond of him.

And so she let them go off for him. In a few moments they came hopping and jumping along followed by an enormous giant.

Some of the little squirrels were perched on his shoulders, and when he sat down they hopped and scampered all over him.

"What's the trouble, little girl?" he asked, and his voice was so very kind.

"I've lost my six wild strawberries," Mahalia answered.

"Six wild strawberries?" squealed the squirrels. "You needn't have cried over those—we can get you more than six."

"But they were in a basket of sweet grass," said Mahalia, "and such a dear friend gave me the basket."

"Oh," said Mr. Giant, "we will have to find that." And he looked all

"Little Stories for Bedtime"

by Thornton W. Burgess

SEEING STRANGE SIGHTS

THE Red Terror, which, as you know, is fire, was sweeping over the Old Pasture. A careless hunter had dropped a lighted match there, and so set the Red Terror loose. Peter Rabbit and Mrs. Peter, watching with frightened hearts from the edge of the Dear Old Briar Patch down on the Green Meadows, saw the great smoke cloud grow and grow and the little red flames leap and dance as they ate up everything in their way. The Green Meadows were not green now, for the grass was brown and dry. It had not rained for a long time. Peter knew something of the Red Terror. He knew that when things are wet the Red Terror is powerless and soon dies, but that when all is dry, as it now was, the Red Terror sweeps all before it. What if it should reach the Green Meadows? Then they would have to run for their lives.

But tender-hearted little Mrs. Peter was thinking more of others just then. What of the little people living in the Old Pasture. What of Old Jed Thumper, the big gray rabbit who was her father? You know it was in the Old Pasture that Peter had found little Miss Fuzztail and made her Mrs. Peter. What of Old Man Coyote, whose home was also in the Old Pasture? Much as little Mrs. Peter feared Old Man Coyote she couldn't bear to think of anything so terrible happening to him as being caught by the Red Terror. That was too dreadful!

All in a flash Peter remembered something. "Why didn't I think of it before!" he cried, kicking his heels together joyfully.

"What?" cried little Mrs. Peter. "Why, we're safe, Fuzzy! We're perfectly safe right here in the Dear Old Briar Patch," replied Peter. "The Old Pasture is on the other side of the Smiling Pool and the Laughing Brook and even if the Red Terror does get on to the Green Meadows it will have to stop when it reaches the water. Let's go over to the Smiling Pool. We can see better there and it is perfectly safe." Peter was so excited he couldn't sit still.

Mrs. Peter, who is a very timid person, indeed, was afraid to go, but when Peter declared he was going anyway, she was still more afraid to be left behind. So they hurried over to the bank of the Smiling Pool.

TO BADGER SOMEBODY

"HE WAS badgered almost to distraction by the importunate demands for payment."

This is the sense in which we see the word "badger" frequently applied, to indicate that whoever it is that is doing the badgering, he is annoying, worrying and severely irritating his victim.

Interestingly enough, the word comes to us from the vocabulary of hunting. For it is exactly in this sense that a badger hunter will treat the badger till the animal in desperation, virtually gives himself up.

Prudent Afterthought
They were making the grand tour of the toy shops, and little Jeannette paused before one doll of that "character" type that has almost unpleasant features, and very bizarre clothing. "Oh, look at that dolly in the green velvet mamma!" exclaimed the little girl. "Isn't she ugly!" Then in the same breath she cautiously restricted, "But still, Santa Claus might say, 'Take that one or nothing!'"

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

JUNE RAIN WATER

THERE is a superstition, common at least in New England, according to the American Folk-Lore society, that rain water caught on July 1 will not "putrify." In some sections the superstition applies also to water taken from springs or streams on that day; and again, in some sections, the date set for the collecting of this "non-putrifying" water is either the third, fourth or fifth of June. Historically the time for the gathering of this water which will remain always fresh should be at the beginning of the new moon in July—the first day of the lunar month—for that was the date of the beginning of the celebration of the annual feast of the Assyrian god Tammuz, who was the same as the Phoenician god Adon, as he was identical with the Babylonian god Dumuzi. Now Tammuz was a nature god especially connected with fertilizing and fruitifying waters, and at his festival, offerings were made to streams as representing him. And rain falling on that day was thought to be especially of his sending—the more so as in many of the places where the worship of Tammuz flourished rain was a rarity. A remnant of that cult, degenerated into a popular superstition, crossed the ocean with the early emigrants and still lingers in the "non-putrifying water" belief among the New England hills.

The Old Gardener

Says:

OF LATE years there has been a tendency in some sections to decri the planting of the Japanese barberry around suburban homes, the plan being made that such planting has been overdone. This is a mistake. It is true that the Japanese barberry has been planted freely but the reason is obvious. It will grow almost anywhere, requires little attention, does not need to be pruned hard even when used for hedges, and is annually covered with red berries, producing a cheerful, warm effect, which lasts all through the winter months. A barberry hedge covered with fruit stands out against a background of naked shrubs and trees like a good deed in a naughty world.

From high school and junior college dramatics to a road stock company—then while playing in California she took a film test and played her first role before the camera—thus charming Evalyn Knapp became identified with motion pictures—and later she was signed on a long term contract. Her rapid stride to leads in the talkies has caused much favorable comment. Miss Knapp was born in Kansas City. She is five feet, four inches tall, and weighs 105 pounds.

TALES...

of the TRIBES

By EDITHA L. WATSON

The Arickara

In Indian sign language, the Arickara are called "corn eaters." They had a small-eared corn which was very delicious, and so popular that it was used as an article of trade.

Corn was a prominent article in their ceremonials, and some of the ears were kept for generations, and were regarded with reverence. The emblematic ear of corn was addressed as "Mother."

Certain rituals were observed at planting and harvesting, as well as at certain times during the growth of the corn. Even the picture writing symbolizing the people stressed the corn motif, and sometimes they were drawn as an ear of corn with human members.

It is hardly necessary to say, then, that from the earliest days of their legendary history, the Arickara were agricultural people, although they spent the winter season hunting buffalo.

While a sedentary people are usually supposed to lack the courage of roving folk, it is evident that fear was an almost unknown emotion to Arickara hearts. They would capture disabled buffalo as they crossed the river, swimming up to the great beasts boldly. Early writers have often described the ferocity of a wounded buffalo, so that the temerity of the Arickara in catching these animals thus is beyond comparison.

Another extremely bold exploit which they performed yearly was the gathering of wood which they took from the river. In the spring, when the ice broke into cakes and floated swiftly and dangerously down the stream, these fearless Indians, men, women, and children, engaged in the occupation of hauling wood ashore. It required a sure foot and a quick hand to leap lightly across the shifting ice cakes, tie a cord to the drifting wood, and return to shore to pull the fuel in.

The Arickara, besides this fearless manner of providing meat and fuel, could boast considerable versatility in the more sedentary arts. They made boats of buffalo hide fastened over a round frame of willow, in which they could cross the Missouri three at a time. They made basket traps to catch fish. Pottery cooking utensils, baskets, stone mortars for crushing corn, horn spoons, flint knives, and hoes made from the shoulder blades of buffalo, were among the products of the Arickara, before these implements could be obtained from traders in simpler and better form.

They had a manner of melting glass beads and pouring the colored liquid into molds to make ornaments, and they also embroidered garments with dyed porcupine quills, to make a very effective decoration.

One of their strange customs was that of "packing" meat on their heads and backs, instead of loading it on their horses. Heavy packs were carried in this way for great distances, and those who excelled in transporting the heaviest burdens sometimes gave the meat to the poor, that they might gain merit, with the Lord of Life thereby.

The Arickara were also skilled in "magic," which is so remarkable when effected by a trained Indian wizard. Not every tribe was fortunate enough to have members who excelled in the art of legerdemain, but those who did regarded this talent with great reverence. Certain forms of magic were believed in by all Indians, and their legends often embody the use of this power.

Their history shows that this was once a southwestern tribe, closely affiliated with the Skidi. The two tribes moved north, but when the Skidi settled on Loup river, Nebraska, the Arickara continued northeastward, meeting some of the Siouian tribes, with whom they were sometimes at war and sometimes at peace. Long ago they built houses along the Missouri almost as far south as Omaha, and these dwellings were later occupied by the Siouian tribes, who were drifting west.

Lewis and Clark met the Arickara in Dakota in 1804, and found them not unfriendly to the United States, but later they became hostile, and, since the rivalry between trading companies caused many of their troubles, they even attacked a trader's boat, killing thirteen men. For a time after this, there was considerable unpleasantness, and to add to their unrest, their crops failed for two years.

They decided to leave the country where so many bad things had come to pass, and to go back to Loup river, where they had left the Skidi, but this became a stay of only two years, as their hostility to the whites prompted the request that they return to the Missouri, and by this time it was very certain that the whites were master.

This was the last eventful move they made, for in 1880 the Fort Berthold reservation was established for the Arickara, Mandan, and Hidatsa, and in 1900 they were given land in severalty, and made citizens of the United States, subject to the laws of North Dakota.

For Meditation

By LEONARD A. BARRETT

THREE FEARS

IN HIS recent address in the Madison Square Garden, President Hoover referred to the "Greatest calamities of human kind as being the fear of poverty, the fear of unemployment, and the fear of old age."

If these fears could be eliminated from our daily life we would be rid of much unnecessary worry, useless anxiety, nervous fatigue and a lot of poor judgment. Mental attitudes are controlled by fears. They often play havoc with the psychic centers. They are like poison, destroying initiative, courage and the spirit of adventure.

Fears, however, need not be fatal. They can be cured. While they may be caused by a mob psychology, the cure in every case is personal and depends entirely upon one's own attitude of mind. The cure is not brought about by some miraculous interference or intervention of an outside power. In the majority of cases what is needed is the exercise of a little common sense.

To dispel the possible fear of poverty let us begin early in life to practice thrift. A dollar saved is a dollar earned. "The traveler finds only what he takes with him." If we insist on living beyond our means and spending all our income as fast as we make it, the result is inevitable. Common sense argues that while poverty is not a crime it is mighty inconvenient and could be avoided if we would put into our daily life the spirit of that saying of Bruyere—"He is poor whose expenses exceed his income."

The fear of unemployment is even more subtle in its appeal. It strikes at the very heart of our economic system. Periods of unemployment may be unavoidable, but if we are prepared against the day of misfortune we shall be able to master it.

The last fear of old age is the most pathetic of all. Why? For some reason many people do not want to grow old. To these persons, Browning's lines may bring a message—"Come grow old along with me—the best of life is yet to be." "We must have much within before we can find much without." If the heart is young, the years matter little. A person is never older than his attitudes are hard. In truth we are no older than we feel. If we will only "Let the heart sing while the hand works" we will have no cause to fear old age.

Mrs. Kathryn Bowser experienced a shock Thursday evening when she was returning home from town. She was near the Benninghoff property, walking along with her head down, thinking about the work of the Alumni banquet menu committee, when all at once she looked up and a stranger was standing in front of her. She became frightened, dashed to one side and then hurried to her home. He followed her home and appeared looking into the window. Sheriff Hoff was called for this. No trace could be found in St. Joe. Later in the evening Ralph Fry reported a prowler at his home east of Coburntown, and deputy sheriff Hanna made an investigation.

JESUS PREPARING FOR THE END

GOLDEN TEXT—And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me. LESSON TEXT—Luke 22:7-30. PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Wants Us to Remember Him. JUNIOR TOPIC—How We Can Remember Him. INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Meaning of the Lord's Supper. YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Meaning of the Lord's Supper.

I. The Last Passover (vv. 7-13).

1. The Passover prepared (vv. 7-13). a. Peter and John sent to prepare the Passover (v. 8). As the time had arrived for the killing of the Passover, Jesus commanded these disciples to make ready for it.

b. The disciples' inquiry (v. 9). They inquired of Jesus as to where they should prepare the Passover. The true disciple is not only ready to do the Lord's bidding, but anxious to know exactly his will.

c. The Master's strange directions (vv. 10-12). They were to go into the city where they would meet a man bearing a pitcher of water. The usual custom was for the women to carry the water. This unusual occurrence would make it easier for them to find the man. He assured them that they would then be shown a large upper room furnished.

d. The obedience of the disciples (v. 13). They did as Jesus directed them. They did not stop to question the sanity of the command but, as true disciples, obeyed.

2. The Passover eaten (vv. 14-18). a. By whom (v. 14). Those who sat down to this last Passover Feast were the Master and the twelve apostles.

b. Jesus' words unto the disciples (vv. 15-18). (1) "I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer" (v. 15). He greatly desired to show them the meaning of the passion through which he was to go.

(2) "It will not be until I have eaten this Passover with you in the kingdom of God" (v. 16). His death was the antitypical fulfillment of the Passover.

(3) "Take this cup and divide it among yourselves" (v. 17, 18). By the token of the cup the disciples were partaking of his shed blood. Drinking anew in the kingdom of God does not mean that in heaven this service will be renewed, but that it was symbolic of the heavenly reality.

II. The Feast of the New Covenant Instituted (vv. 19, 20). This feast took place at the close of the paschal supper.

1. The bread a symbol of Christ's body (v. 19). As bread nourishes and strengthens our bodies, so Christ is food to our spiritual nature. Unless our souls feed upon Christ, we shall perish.

2. The cup a symbol of Christ's blood (v. 20). This was symbolic of the atonement which was made by the shedding of his blood on Calvary's cross. He said, "This cup is the new testament in my blood which was shed for you," indicating that each one must personally accept the atonement made by the shedding of his blood.

III. The Wicked Behavior at the Feast (vv. 21-27). 1. The treachery of Judas (vv. 21-23). a. The time of its manifestation (v. 21). It was while they were eating the last Passover that Jesus made the announcement of the betrayal, perhaps that Judas might be given an opportunity at this last moment to repent.

b. The betrayal was by the detestable counsel of God (v. 22 Cf. Acts 2:23). Nothing takes place by chance. Even the sinful acts of wicked men come within the permissive province of God. This does not, however, lessen the guilt of sinners, for Jesus said, "Woe unto the man by whom he is betrayed."

c. The sorrowful question (v. 23). The disciples did not seem to suspect one another but made the question a personal one.

2. The selfish ambition of the disciples (vv. 24-27). In this tragic hour the disciples were so concerned with the thought of position that they were striving among themselves as to who should be the greatest.

IV. The Apostles' Place in the Kingdom (vv. 28-30). Jesus assured them that those who continued with him in his trials would be appointed a place in the Kingdom which would enable them to eat and drink at his table and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

In the Redeemer's Debt For us, who are deep in the Redeemer's debt, who have had much forgiveness, who every day are bankrupt debtors to the measureless mercy of infinite love—for us no paltriness will suffice.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Great Things From God We should expect great things from God. He is a great God; he is in the habit of doing great things. Let us expect the great things and we shall have them.—John R. Mott.

"Roberta, were you going to marry this fellow?"

Roberta looked at him with a wide stare. Had she really been going to do that? It seemed impossible. It seemed years ago that she had thought she hated this man and loved Jack. How stupid she had been. How silly! Why the man was common! Somehow she could not meet Sir George's eyes.

"I suppose I did mean to at one time," she admitted. "I was so determined to do something desperate—to get away from everything and everybody, but I won't do it now."

"Good girl!" And then Sir George added: "You couldn't anyhow. That's why I came to stop you. He's married already."

"You lie!"

"Oh, no I don't," he said. "I can testify for Jack's face had been in constant confirmation. I saw her at the dock and I heard it at headquarters. Unless you've murdered her quite recently, she's still your wife."

Roberta was staring at Jack in horror. She had let a thing like this trick her!

"Roberta's quite through with you," Sir George told him shortly. "And I will be in a few minutes, after you have told me how you got hold of the fact that I was taking the payroll money up the river."

Roberta whirled. "Was he—he was in, too?"

He nodded. He concealed his surprise that she should ask this. How he had misjudged Roberta! "Come," he said to Jack. "I haven't any time to waste. Who told you?"

"She did."

"Oh, no! No!" Roberta's voice rang out violently. "You don't believe him, do you?"

"Not if you say you didn't," Sir George told her promptly, "though I own it did look like that to me at first."

"I never told him!"

Jack laughed. "You dare to say I did?"

Jack nodded. "Everything I knew I got it from you, consciously or unconsciously. You told me several things that put me on the track and it needed only a little questioning about road and cars and banks to get all I wanted out of you."

Roberta flung her forearm across her eyes, and leaned against the wall. She could not face Sir George. She had been this man's tool. She had been a traitor in her own father's house. She had been tricked by Jack into believing the things he said against Sir George.

He was saying quite distinctly, though you could tell from his tone how tired he was, "Call them in, Roberta."

Roberta opened the door. She came back and stood near the bed as the men with the exception of the doctor, who had gone on his rounds, filed in. "You will please tell this man before these witnesses that you are through with him utterly and forever."

"I am through with you," Roberta said between her teeth, "and if I were a man I would kill you."

"It's—!" Jack wringed, though his blood was dark behind his olive skin, "fortunate you're not, and I'm not done with you. I tell you before these witnesses that I have letters of your marriage license and your promise to marry me. Your coming all this distance to do it will make good reading in the newspapers."

Sir George turned to Ariett. "Shoot it out double quick, whatever it is you want," said Ariett, stolidly. "I've got a lot of things to do."

"Nothing more important than this. You've heard this young lady refuse to marry this man, and also heard him threaten to make a scandal about it."

"Huh!" exclaimed the fat constable. "Women's got a right to change their minds."

"Sure!" said the younger constable, reviving his cud. "You can't legislate against that."

"Roberta, tell Judge Ariett that you are not going to marry our friend Jack."

"Nothing will make me marry him," "Well, that's plain," Ariett's tone was friendly. "Guess you've got your walking papers, son, so why not take them quietly and go?"

Jack walked toward the bed. "I can make trouble and I will. What you going to do about it?"

"Prove you a liar," Sir George said quietly. "Roberta, get the paper in the right hand pocket of my coat, if it wasn't burned up."

"It's here," Roberta said meekly. She had a sudden vision—every time she looked at Jack—of what it would be like to go meekly back to the island and Green Bend, and a day or so later see her letters and promises embellishing the front page of the papers. Her father would suffer, and every one would know what a fool she had been.

She opened the coat pocket and took the folded paper out of it. She handed it to Sir George.

He feebly waved it toward Ariett. "Show it to him, Bobbie," he whispered, "and tell him two can play at that game and you were just spoofing this man. You never meant to do it. That is why I followed you."

She stared at him. "Did father send you? Does he know?"

"No," Sir George whispered. "No one sent me. Do you think I'd let you down? Look at the paper."

"But why should you—?" Roberta began and then suddenly conscious of the others, she hurriedly unfolded the paper. She looked at it, gasped and turned to him. She opened her mouth to speak, but Sir George put his hand over it. "Give it to the Judge," he ordered.

Meekly, and so unlike the Roberta he had known that his heart contracted with pain and tenderness, she took it across to Ariett who, back against the door, surveyed it.

"H'm!" He looked at Jack. "This here's a perfectly good New Jersey marriage license made out for Roberta MacBeth and Sir George Sandison. Who's Sir George Sandison?"

"What?" Jack came nearer and looked at the paper.

"Sir George," Roberta cried.

He held her hand. "It's quite all right. You see, Jack, there's no question now of a defenseless girl returning home, after a theatrical attempt at elopement, to be covered with shame and confusion while her father's pocketbook is emptied by a man who couldn't possibly marry her, Roberta's been playing you—so that her father might lay hands on you and your gang."

He held Roberta's hand tightly, so that she could not move. The puny and watchful judge came forward as the two constables held the door.

"All the time you thought you were running away with her, she knew that she had another man, simply mad to marry her, following close behind. Can't keep up with the modern woman, Jack. Even a clever chap like you, self has no chance. She has us, as the Americans say, 'going and coming.'"

"You're bluffing. This girl never intends to marry you."

Sir George laughed. It was a feeble laugh but it irritated Jack.

"It's a bluff and you can't bluff me. I've got her letters and my story and I'll—"

He came up against Ariett and the two constables at the door.

"You keep yourself to yourself," Ariett said. "No pushing and shoving until this thing's straight. What do you want done with him, no longer?"

Sir George clung to Roberta's hand, but he restrained from looking at her. He was Roberta would she could not free her hand.

"Roberta, my dear, Judge Ariett can marry us just as tightly and just as well as any person, and Jack and the constables will be our witnesses. Will you, Roberta?"

He asked it recklessly. Roberta would, of course, refuse and demand to be taken home to her father, but at least it would silence Jack and make any attempt at blackmail impossible.

Roberta hesitated and as she did Jack laughed aloud. "You see," he said to Ariett. "It's sheer bluff! The girl came with me to marry me and no one else. He can't save her face that way."

Sir George stared straight ahead of him, smiling, waiting.

"Judge Ariett," said Roberta, in a very low voice, "will you marry us now—and do anything you like with that—?" She indicated Jack.

"Sure. We can jail him easy, afterward."

Sir George could not take his eyes from the girl, who did not look at him now. "Roberta!" he murmured but she did not answer. She had thrown her head back and, leaning against the wall, she faced Jack.

She said to him, "He did not doubt for a moment that to lose Roberta now was a life and death matter to him, but Roberta was too young to understand or be pitiful."

He was so much interested in Jack's plight, he forgot his own.

Jack, who had once loomed important in Roberta's life, was less than nothing now, and knew it. He made a swift leap toward the door, while the constables gaped at Roberta, but Ariett was in his way, ponderous, unmoved and immovable.

"You keep away from that door," young man," he said without emotion or excitement. "You're wanted as a witness." He motioned to the younger constable. "Stand between the door and this wildcat. As justice of the peace, young man, I can lock you up and will do so if there's any more disorderly resistance. Ready, both of you?"

"Oh!" Roberta whispered.

Sir George put out his hand. "Not unless you want to, Roberta. If you'd rather wait, I'll take you back to your father. I'll understand."

Jack laughed nervously. "I told you it was a bluff." He turned to the judge and said vehemently, "The girl doesn't want to marry him. This foreign grifter is after her money."

Roberta gave a little gasp. She said to her knees beside the bed, put her arms about his neck and her lips close to his ear.

"George—do you really love me? Aunt Aggy said—you did."

At the moment, Sir George, dumfounded at Aggy's audacity, could not speak. Then it came to him and suddenly that here was just a bewildered, frightened little red-headed girl. Such a surge of tenderness went through him at the touch of her lips on his ear that his whole body trembled. His eye met hers steadily. Roberta's eyelids drooped.

"Don't be a silly little fox," he said and put a bandaged hand on hers. "If this is Aggy's plan how can we go far wrong?"

As he looked at her, he knew instantly that it was no thought of her own dilemma that he doubted if he girl to turn to him. He doubted if she would even flinch at the thought of her silence every stammering tongue if she was to return to the island as Lady Sandison had crossed her mind. He was hurt and wounded in her defense and Aunt Aggy had said he was doing of love for her, so she was doing wholeheartedly what she could to heal his wounds and his heart.

"All set?" he asked Ariett. He indicated Jack to the younger constable. "Hurry the Bad Egg, if he explodes."

"You'll make him sign the certificate, Judge?" Sir George asked. "A photograph of that signature will do away with any blackmailing scheme he has in his dirty mind. I will make him a laughing stock in his own refined circle. If that doesn't remove him from our path I'll take a gun. I'm growing quite American, you see."

"No guns," said Judge Ariett disapprovingly. "I don't hold with them. But I'll offer this dark-complected young fellow the chance to sign and get away while the going's good."

"I'll sign to oblige the lady or I'll be compelled to tell the judge my suspicions as to his complicity with the gang who tried to get MacBeth's payroll."

He paused significantly, and held Roberta's hand tightly to prevent her from speaking, for he saw that to Roberta the knowledge that this man had used her to harm her father was the most overwhelming blow.

Jack looked at them, then at the other three men. "I'll sign," he muttered.

"Ready?" asked Ariett.

CHAPTER XIV

Robert MacBeth was growing anxious. He had been wheeled out to watch the distant fire, but that had long since died down and it grew dark with Roberta and Sir George still missing, and no word excitement on the part of the guests from New York, because the bridge was gone. There was no direct communication with the other side now, so they must go further down the river and cross at Bridgetown for their return. It meant they must leave earlier. Last night Sandison had been about, arranging for an early supper, and for a time there was so much hurry and excitement that the absence of daughter and secretary was apparently forgotten.

When they had all gone, Ray Brown had time to wonder why the secretary did not return with his car.

Sir George glanced at Robert MacBeth sitting silent beside him and tried to guess what he was thinking. They watched the long procession of cars returning from up the river and from watching the fire. Still no word from either Roberta or Sir George.

Brown felt he must make light of the fact that the two had not returned, for Robert MacBeth's sake.

"Something wrong with my car. The little beast is always breaking down," he said, as he went away in one of the MacBeth cars.

"Aggy, Aggy," her brother said, shaking his head. "Firemen have wives and families."

Historic Buildings in City of Philadelphia

Its wealth of historical landmarks and associations and its close proximity with other cities and places of interest on the east coast, Philadelphia on the main roadway of eastern tourists travel. To the visitor interested in the nation's history this city offers associations which are identified with it alone and which distinguish it among all other American towns. Chief among these is Independence Hall, where the Liberty bell reposes and within whose walls the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States were drawn and signed.

Many of the most interesting old landmarks are confined to a small area on the central part of town, among these being Carpenter's hall, meeting place of the first Continental Congress; the Betsy Ross house, where the first American flag is said to have been made and old Christ church, place of worship of Revolutionary heroes and in whose graveyard lies the body of Benjamin Franklin. Congress hall is another point of interest.

There are no bicuspids in the first set of teeth. The first temporary premolars as they are usually called—generally appear by the end of the first year. The second premolars appear about the third year. There are 20 deciduous or baby teeth.

REPUBLICAN Spain, latest among ancient monarchies to cast off royal traditions, can be visualized through its leading cities. For it was the Spanish urban dweller, not the peasant of the countryside, who kept alive the long fight for political reform.

First in importance comes Madrid, the capital. It is strikingly modern in many aspects. It is quite up-to-date in its geography student's mental picture of a typical Spanish city; for Madrid's city planners long ago gouged broad, straight streets where narrow, tortuous mazes once ran and low red-roofed houses whose eaves nearly met overhead, have given way to modern structures.

Now and then an ox-cart from the rural district rumbles toward the market place; dark-eyed senoritas in mantillas and brilliant colored shawls venture in the streets beside caped swains with gay vests and trousers; and bullfights still are popular pastimes; but Madrid for the most part is a bit of Paris, London and New York set down on a Spanish plain within a hundred miles of Toledo and other more typically Spanish cities and towns.

Subway trains roar over a network of tracks beneath Madrid's streets, crisscrossing taxicabs are at the viaduct and call, huge motor buses, and modern cars, with mail boxes attached, course the city streets.

Cables that carry the human voice and the tick of the telephone key to all the capitals of Europe have recently been placed underground, and an underground sewage system, and an underground water supply system carrying sufficient water to enable street cleaners to wash down the streets several times a day, assure public health.

Shop windows like those of Fifth Avenue display the latest fashions from London and Paris, radios and electric equipment from American factories. Bobbed-haired shoppers trip from Detroit-made automobiles.

The National Sport

When the bullfight is on, a large part of Madrid's sporting population still flows toward the ring or toward the newspaper bulletin boards for minute by minute reports, just as Americans gather about our newspaper of fieses watching play by play a world's series game recorded on an electric baseball. "movies" with the names of Hollywood's celebrities emblazoned in electric lights and on gaudy posters also enjoys the popularity of amusement seekers.

Numerous parks and playgrounds have been laid out, new subdivisions have risen above the surrounding plains, and the city fathers are busy tearing down the old and building the new. But with all the changes, the Puerto del Sol, the so-called hub of the city, remains the "center of everything" that it was a century ago. Mingling with the city folk are stocky Basques from the Pyrenean country, ruddy-skinned gypsies, olive-complexioned individuals from the South, a sprinkling of Frenchmen, Englishmen, Italians, and a few representatives from nearly all other European countries and America.

One of the spokes of the hub leads to the $15,000,000 royal palace. The palace yard has long been a public park and playground where throngs of men and women strolled on royal walks, and children played games.

Madrid's oldest pages of history are newer than those of its Spanish neighbors. Philip II chose it as the Spanish capital in 1560 when he sought to set aside the various races of Spain. Sargos was Aragonese, Burgos was Castilian, Toledo was Valencian, and Cordoba and Seville were Moorish. From a city of about 80,000 inhabitants, it has steadily grown until it now is almost as large as Cleveland, Ohio.

Madrid is the geographic center of Spain, and in the same manner that all the main avenues of Washington radiate from the Capital building, so in

MODERN GAS SERVICE FOR EVERY RURAL HOME

Pressure Gas Appliances Make It Possible for Everybody to Light, Heat and Cook With Gas.

Nowadays the women of the farm and small towns can be just as modern as their city sisters in running their households. Indeed, they need not even envy the gas service of their city relatives. They can have modern gas service for lighting, heating and cooking. And at low cost, too—though they live miles and miles from any gas mains.

Coleman pressure gas appliances—cook stoves, lamps, lanterns, radiant heaters, irons, water heaters, etc.—make these conveniences possible. And these appliances have been so well perfected that in most cases a scratch of a match and a turn of a valve lights them instantly. The big convenience feature is that they are complete in themselves—they make and burn their own gas from regular motor fuel. You don't have to hire a plumber or pipefitter to connect them up—there are no pipes or tubes. They are ready to serve you, right when you have them delivered.

With these gas-making, gas-burning appliances, the rural housewife is saved much time each day, to say nothing of the unpleasant and burdensome tasks that are abolished.

Interesting pamphlets describing and illustrating the various pressure gas appliances may be had without charge by writing to The Coleman Lamp & Stove Co., 500 Coleman Bldg., Wichita, Kansas.—Adv.

OVER-HEATING CHICKS

(By Prof. H. D. Munroe)

There are going to be a lot of late hatched chicks brooded this year. There is going to be lots of trouble with late hatched chicks. We are going to blame everything and everybody for this trouble. Probably the most common cause of this trouble is going to be over-heating.

When we had poorly constructed brooder houses and brooder stoves that were by no means perfected, chilling was an important cause of brooder trouble. But, with better houses, good stoves and especially with late season brooding, we will have to watch over-heating far more than chilling.

For late spring and early summer brooding 90 degrees at the edge of the hover is warm enough for the first week. Each week after the first, lower the temperature 5 degrees until 70 degrees is reached. This will mean that after the chicks are five weeks old they will need heat only at night and during cold, rainy days. If they are taught to roost by this time there is no need for any heat in a well constructed brooder house after the sixth week.

Over-heating causes the chicks to have low vitality or poor resistance to disease. During the first two weeks over-heated chicks will develop bowel trouble. After that period coccidiosis is liable to get into a flock of low vitality chicks.

Make late hatched chicks "tough" and there will be no more trouble raising them than with early hatched chicks.

HORSE SENSE

Many good breeding cockerels go to market as a result of marketing them at the earliest possible date. Keep the most likely looking pure bred males for breeders, when sorting the broilers for market.

Don't let anything interfere with the regular twice-a-week cleaning of the hen house dropping boards now that fly time is here. Flies carry to the chicks any tape worm eggs which may be present in the droppings of adult birds.

MARIE PEARY, 'SNOW BABY', HAD MUSK OX CALF AS PET

But She Found Animal too Boisterous to Be Kept in City Apartment.

New York.—A musk ox calf makes a fine pet for a girl, but you can't keep one in a city apartment. Marie Ahnigh to Peary, daughter of the famous Arctic explorer, tried it, and learned to her sorrow it couldn't be done.

Miss Peary, who was known as the "Snow Baby" because she was born in Greenland on one of her father's expeditions, tells about her musk ox difficulties in Good Housekeeping Magazine. The calf, she says, was a fast grower, and when she got him back to civilization she had to turn him over to a zoo.

"On one of the hunting trips," she explains, "the Eskimos killed a group of four musk oxen and were preparing to skin them when my father noticed a small black object about 100 yards away. Going over to it he found a strange woolly little ball, a young musk ox calf. The poor baby had gone for a walk while its parents were grazing, and it didn't know it had suddenly become an orphan.

"The calf seemed to think dad was a long lost friend, for it ran right to the shelter of his legs and accompanied him back to camp. That night they slept together—at least they lay down side by side and tried to sleep. The calf was covered with a corner of musk ox skin, but this did not seem to make him feel at home. He nibbled dad's hair, licked his nose, and pawed his face with his hoofs, which though tiny were by no means soft. Altogether, it was an uncomfortable night, and dad was glad to get him safely back to the ship and turn him over to my care.

"I was delighted. We named him Sambo at once, because he was so black, and he was the most cuddly looking animal you ever beheld."

Miss Peary says in her Good Housekeeping article that the story about Eskimo women chewing their husbands' boots to get them soft is no tall tale. She has seen them do it.

Il Duce Plans to Start a New Gambling State

Paris.—While the rulers of Monaco are squabbling as to how to use the gambling spoils, Mussolini has been planning to become dictator of the green tables, according to reports.

It is said that he plans to create an "independent gambling state" of San Remo to rival Monte Carlo.

Creation of this new country would enable San Remo to device gambling laws of her own. Introduce every known kind of game of chance, attract big finance, and, last but not least, probably bring to the new casino the famed Greek banking concession, which went on a strike more than six months ago against the French government's new taxes on the beseeching bank.

There have been rumors for a long time of an Italian attempt to cut in on the French Riviera's profits by creating a new world of entertainment on the Mediterranean. It is said that the authorities on the other side of the border now consider the time ripe to make war on Monte Carlo and that the independent state of San Remo will result.

Defendant's Joy Over Verdict Is Short Lived

Columbus, Ohio.—"Not guilty!" read the clerk of the court from a jury's findings.

The youthful defendant sighed in relief and sagged down in his chair. "Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, is that your true verdict?" asked Judge Mahaffey as a matter of routine.

"No," emphatically answered the jurors. The foreman then explained the defendant had been found guilty—but the wrong verdict was signed. The error was corrected.

Largest Steel Casting Weighs 460,000 Lbs.

Bethlehem, Pa.—The world's largest steel casting, weighing 460,000 pounds, was shown here today in the Lehigh plant of the Bethlehem Steel company. It is a platen, or cylinder jacket, for the 14,000-ton forging press of the Bethlehem plant. Such devices heretofore have been built up of separate parts. It is 12 feet 10 inches high, 28 feet 4 inches long and 10 feet 2 inches wide. Six open-hearth furnaces were used for melting the steel simultaneously for the casting.

Family Gathering When Billy Arnold, Race Champ, Competes at Indianapolis

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., May.—It is a family affair when Billy Arnold, winner of last year's 500-mile race, rolls to the starting tape to defend his championship honors in the running of the event this year, on May 30, at the Indianapolis Motor Speedway, in the front wheel drive car entered by Harry Hartz.

Harry's pretty wife and Billy's young mother, frequently identified as his sister, sit in a front row box immediately across the track from the Arnold-Hartz pit.

Billy's younger brother, a copy boy on a Chicago newspaper, helps Harry in the pit while Billy whirls around the two-and-one-half brick and concrete speed ribbon.

They have a big reunion after the race. Last May it was unusually large—after Billy won the race with Harry's car.

A fight more than a century old broke out anew when forty Miami Indians jammed the City Court at Peru to defend Peter Mongosa, 22-year-old Indian youth. Mongosa was arrested for shooting fish in the Wabash River. The Indians, dressed in native spring suits, sat quietly in court. Their spokesman, a young Indian chief, declared that by a treaty, signed with their tribe in 1800, they were allowed to hunt and fish in Miami County without restraint. Miami County was a part of an Indian reservation sold to the government in 1800.

WHEN TO SELL BROILERS

(By Prof. Paul G. Riley)

Nine out of ten poultry raisers are better off if they will sell broilers at two to two and a half pounds for heavy birds and one and a half to two pounds for Leghorns, rather than to carry them on to heavier weights.

One of the important reasons for this is that most brooder houses are carrying all the chicks they can house, and then a few more. This overcrowded condition doesn't become noticeable until the chicks are eight to ten weeks of age. If the cockerels are kept much longer than this, the pullets are crowded and stunted, and it means that they come into egg production late, that they are undersized and poorly developed, and that colds are much more likely to occur.

The biggest reason, however, is that as much money can be gotten per head for a chicken that is sold weighing two to two and a half pounds as can usually be gotten for the same bird weighing twice that much. This is especially true of chicks hatched during March and April.

Our lowest broiler prices usually occur from July 15th to October 1st. If broilers in June are worth 25c a pound, poultry in August and September is likely to be worth 15c to 18c. That means that the April-hatched cockerel can be sold in June for 50c, but if the same bird is kept until September, when he weighs twice as much, the probabilities are that we will only get 60c for the same bird. Of course, in the meantime we have had the pleasure of this young rooster's company and have fed him a goodly amount of feed. There has been no return for labor, and we have not even gotten back the additional feed cost.

MEMORIAL DAY

A man's religion, or lack of it, might prevent his seeing any special significance in Christmas or Easter; he might be so recently come to this country that the Fourth of July would not mean much to him; the circumstances of his life might be such that he would not be especially moved by Thanksgiving; the whoopee of New Year's might not appeal to him; he might not be enthused at the birthdays of Washington and Lincoln; but where does there exist in America one who is not touched by the pure and hallowed sentiment of Memorial Day? It is an occasion where there is no room for selfishness or difference of opinion. It is a day of tribute and memorial to those who have paid the noblest sacrifice on earth; the sacrifice of life to one's country; an observance where both friend and foe can bow their heads in common acknowledgment and feel that there is an ideal which, in spite of strife, in spite of war, in spite of differences of any sort, makes all men akin. The spirit of Memorial Day is not of enmity nor of that which breeds and will perpetuate war; it is the spirit which makes men understand each other; points to the nobility that is in all races and creeds; the spirit that in time will abolish war. At Christmas we celebrate in devotion the anniversary of the Man of Peace. Memorial Day we pay tribute to the men who gave their lives that peace might be brought nearer. There is much in common, much of the same spiritual purity in the two observances. Those who decry war memorials and war memorials, if there be any who decry the latter, should consider the peculiar spiritual circumstances which gave rise to our spring holiday. It came from a spontaneous tribute by the women of the South to soldiers of both sides in the Civil War. Met to decorate the graves of their own men who perished in the conflict, they showed impartiality by strewing with flowers the graves of Federal soldiers as well. In view of all the rancor that prevailed, all the bitterness and suffering as a result of the war, what action could have been more noble and beautiful than that? Where is there a purer sentiment than that which makes our annual observance a memorial to friend and foe alike?

The First Memorial Day

The beautiful custom of setting aside one day in the year for the decoration of soldiers' graves is said to have originated in Petersburg, Va., where Memorial Day was observed for the first time on June 9, 1865, in honor of Confederates who were killed in battle there just one year before. In 1868 the wife of General John A. Logan, then commander of the G. A. R., happened to be in Petersburg on its Memorial Day, and was so impressed with the tributes of flowers and flags with which the graves were decorated that she suggested to the general that this be made a national custom. General Logan accordingly issued an order to the G. A. R. "that every post of the Grand Army should hold suitable exercises and decorate the graves of their dead comrades with flowers," on May 30 of each year.

Mrs. Harry Kees, Prop.

The idea spread throughout the South, also, Confederate Memorial Day is observed in various states on the following dates: April 26 in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi and Florida; May 10 in North and South Carolina; the second Friday in May in Tennessee, and June 3 in Louisiana. In the south the national Memorial Day of May 30 is more generally observed since the World War, the exercises being conducted by the American Legion.

At the national cemetery of Arlington, near Washington, the grave of America's Unknown Soldier is decorated with special ceremonies, usually participated in by the president and other high officials, on Memorial Day. It is highly fitting that all citizens should join in the observance of this most beautiful and sacred of our national holidays.

100 SOLDIERS BURIED IN NEWVILLE CEMETERY

The American Legion will provide flags for all Soldiers' graves, May 30. These will remain permanently, being replaced each year with new ones. There are nearly 100 soldiers buried in Newville cemetery, including Civil War, Spanish American and World War veterans, perhaps the largest number of any cemetery in the county. A suitable monument should be erected to their memory, to replace the old wooden one, covered with slate. Other cemeteries have beautiful Soldiers' monuments—why not Newville?—Correspondent.

WASHING CURTAINS

Net and lace curtains may be dried with even hems and sides if heavy curtain rods are run through the hems at the top and bottom, and the curtains are suspended. The rod at the top may rest on two nails or hooks, or the curtain may be hung at a window with the rod slipped into the rod supports. The weight of the rod at the bottom stretches the curtain evenly and holds it in place as it dries. After the curtain is dry, it may be pressed lightly with a warm iron to give it a sheen and a finished appearance.

Changing Color of Gold
The color of gold can be changed by alloying it with various other metals. The old method was to alloy it with about five times as much silver, but as such articles readily tarnished, a new process was introduced which does away with the use of silver. Certain base metals are added to give the white appearance, the amount of gold and of alloy being the same as in the case of ordinary gold of various carats.

Hair's Growth After Death
Certain claims have been made that in rare cases hair has been proved to have grown after death. The United States public health service has stated there are no authentic records of such cases. The widespread belief in this growth is held to be caused by the shrinking of the skin toward the roots of the hairs, giving an appearance of hair growth. The same may be said with regard to growth of nails.

NE-HI BOTTLING CO.

BEVERAGES FOR TODAY AND TOMORROW

The very name of the NE-HI BOTTLING CO., South Main street, AUBURN, Phone 657-W, speaks for its popularity.

Since its introduction to the beverage drinkers of this country, no drink has been more popular nor has the number of users so increased. This firm is the official bottling works for NE-HI in this community. Thousands of bottles of this delicious drink are taken from this plant to all parts of this community and into adjacent towns and cities.

As in every other community, this popular beverage has come into such a demand here that this concern has hardly been able to supply it. Its trucks leave daily filled with cases of NE-HI only to return just as heavily loaded with cases of bottles to be sterilized and filled again.

You never have any doubts about the safety of drinking this popular beverage as far as cleanliness is questioned. NE-HI has been found by tests made at various times to be twelve times as pure as ordinary drinking water such as is found on trains and in public places, or if you had any question about the sanitation of the bottling process, such doubts will be immediately banished when you visit this modern and up-to-date bottling works of the NE-HI BOTTLING CO. Every bottle and every piece of the bottling machinery is kept thoroughly sterilized at all times. From the time the bottle enters the sterilizing process until they emerge filled, corked, and ready to be cased and delivered, they are hardly touched by human hands. No opportunity is given for bacteria to enter the beverage and the public may be assured that there is no danger in drinking NE-HI which has been bottled in this plant.

They are also bottlers of all flavors of Carbonated Beverages and Gingerale. These popular drinks are sold by nearly every dealer in this section.

MR. GARNES, the manager of this concern, is a highly respected citizen in the community. Too often the managers of such concerns come into a community and are indifferent to all community interests. Not so with this man. Any community project which deserves support can be assured of his backing.

Vitamin A Foods

Kill Coughs, Colds

When planning her meals during the winter months, the wise home-maker includes in the family diet foods rich in the vitamin A. For this food factor is a bulwark against low resistance to infection which reflects itself in coughs, colds and other cold weather ailments. Total absence of vitamin A often results in xerophthalmia, a serious eye disease.

Eggs, butter and milk provide generous amounts of this important food factor. To supply an adequate amount of vitamin A is one of the reasons why dietitians urge "an egg a day" for every member of the family. Not only is this a safe standard to adopt, they declare, but it is an economical one as well, due to the present low prices of eggs.

Egg yolk ranks next to cod liver oil in the amount of vitamin A it furnishes, according to Dr. H. B. Sherman, an authority on nutrition.

The daily egg need not always be eaten at breakfast, dietitians point out. It is possible to use the egg as the basis of a variety of delicious main dishes for luncheon or for dinner.

Plan Nation-Wide Crime Conference

Plans for an international conference in Chicago of state's attorneys, police chiefs, and other law enforcement officers, have begun following a long distance conversation between State's Attorney Swanson and District Attorney Byron Pitts of Los Angeles.

The Los Angeles prosecutor said he had mailed a letter to Mr. Swanson, outlining his plans and suggestions for such a conference, to be held in Chicago in the near future.

Mr. Swanson expressed himself as highly in favor of the project, and stated that after the receipt of the letter, he would prepare to send invitations to the various crime apprehension officials in all the larger cities of the United States and Canada.

The idea apparently originated from the State's Attorneys' Association of Illinois, and it was regarded as probable that if the conference is a success, a national organization of prosecutors may be formed.

Among the things to be taken up, according to Mr. Swanson, will be extradition, and the conflicting laws on the subject in the various states.

ZEP SPANS WORLD FIVE TIMES NOW RESTING UP

Friedrichshafen, Ger.,—"Graf Zeppelin," Germany's dirigible veteran, has spanned the globe more than five times, theoretically speaking.

The airship so far has performed 158 flights, covering altogether 231,000 kilometers, roughly estimated, which is more than five times the length of the equator. Its flying season has now ended and the ship will be kept in the hangar during the winter months, when it will be thoroughly overhauled.

A spinster's maiden aim is to change her maiden name.

Florida Hunters Shoot Holes in Goodyear Zep

St. Petersburg, Fla.—Hunters in the swamps west of Winter Haven put four bullet holes in the Goodyear Zeppelin, the Mayflower, as it flew toward St. Petersburg recently.

The punctures in the bag are within a few feet of the cabin, but were not discovered until today when the Zeppelin showed a loss of 2,000 cubic feet of helium.

Commander Karl Lange with two men were in the ship at the time of the shooting. They were flying at an altitude of 500 feet on their return from Winter Haven and saw four men hunting with dogs. They saw puffs of smoke, but did not suspect the blimp was the target.

The most troublesome load to carry is a bundle of bad habits.

The man who gets something for nothing is always surprised to discover that it is worth just about what he paid for it.

BLUME DRY GOODS STORE

LOW PRICES FOR THE BEST GOODS

Quantity purchases mean lower prices. That is the secret of the BLUME DRY GOODS STORE, South Broadway, BUTLER, which has been serving the public for over a quarter of a century.

The management knows where to purchase the best goods manufactured for the lowest prices. Being a large buyer they can command a much better price than the merchant who buys small quantities.

The function of the BLUME DRY GOODS STORE OF BUTLER is to supply every need of the buying public. There are three phases to this service, and all three are found in the superlative degree in this store. The first and primary interest to the buyer is quality and price. Realizing this the management of this store brings to bear its great purchasing powers.

In stocking the store with Dry Goods and Ladies Ready-to-Wear at the lowest possible prices. Those in charge realize that their customers must be satisfied, that if they are not they will withdraw their patronage and advise their friends to do likewise. And, conversely, they realize that a satisfied customer is an asset, not only in volume of business by their own purchase, but by advertising their satisfaction among their friends by word of mouth.

The second necessity is courtesy. It is a hard and fast rule among the employees of this store that the person who buys a ten or fifteen cent article must be given the same courteous consideration as the person whose purchase runs into three figures.

The third requirement is Service—with a Capital S. In a great measure the success of this store is due to the fact that it has in stock every need of the man, woman and child. It has experienced managers at the head of every department, managers who know what the public wants and whose duty it is to see that that want is satisfied. They must see to it that the latest style is in stock, that every design is tasteful, that the quality is unexcelled and that the price is the best offered anywhere.

The BLUME DRY GOODS STORE OF BUTLER, has fulfilled these three obligations to the public. And as a result it is a mecca for the shoppers who know that here they will find what they want at the right price. They can feel safe in taking the advice of the experienced department managers, or in accepting a suggestion from the clerks.

And so buying power, combined with courtesy and service has made the BLUME DRY GOODS STORE OF BUTLER the success that it is, the central unit in the mercantile system of this community.

ENGLISH PROFESSOR

CALLS NEW ART UGLY

London—"The world today is only half-educated and half-knowing," says Dr. Cyril Norwood, headmaster of Harrow School, in an address to the Mathematical Association.

"We live," he declared, "in an age of ugly art, bad colors and inharmonious music; an age which has experienced the revolt of youth."

Further he said that the government of Great Britain was in the hands of the masses. Those who hold the reins of power are those who can best persuade the ignorant.

Dr. Norwood said that the revolt of youth might "lead to a sounder interpretation of beauty and truth."

Tea for Three, Backstage

HERE are three little girls from a current Broadway success enjoying a sweet snack between acts back stage. Sweet! Oh, yes, they say it must be sweet, because scientists have proved that sugar is the quickest acting of all energy foods. And energy is what they need, for the rigors of musical comedy have decreed that the girls in their shows must have "vim, vigor and vitality" plus. So, if the girls feel a little peevish at the end of an act, they send out an S. O. S. for a sweet. Fannie Brice takes her energy straight in the form of lump sugar.

Variety is the spice of life. A wide variety of vegetables is desirable for the home garden.

Many poultry raisers prefer to feed milk to chicks while it is still sweet rather than to wait for it to sour. Changing from sweet to sour milk will result in no harmful effects.

Gas groundhogs with calcium cyanide before the end of June; doing it at this time will kill the groundhogs and save rabbits that might be in the den at other seasons.

Bordeaux mixture is the best general spray for vegetables and flowers. To make it, dissolve two tablespoons of blue vitriol in three quarts of water; dissolve five tablespoons of lime in a quart of water, add it to the blue vitriol solution, and stir thoroughly.

SLAYS BROTHER AND HIDES BODY

Boy Confesses to Ghastly Murder Following Quarrel Over Car.

Stevens Point, Wis.—The murder of his brother, in cold blood, was confessed here recently by Anton Riske, seventeen, after a neighbor's boy on the way to school found pools of fresh blood on the road, mingled with bits of brain tissue which proved upon examination to be human. The body of the slain youth was recovered later from the Wisconsin river.

Riske said that he and his brother John, twenty-five, who lived with their widowed mother, Mrs. Mary Riske, on a farm in the town of Carsons, had been having trouble over use of John's car and that he determined to kill John.

"When we went out in the car," he told District Attorney John Melick and Sheriff John Kubistka, "I took my shotgun along and sat in the back seat. I said I would use it to scare some dogs that always ran out at us. I loaded the gun while John drove and when we got by a big stubble field I aimed at the back of his head and

Forty Cars Face Starter In 500-Mile Race at Indianapolis Track This Year

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., May.—Forty cars—the largest number in history—will face the flags in the start of the 500-mile race at the Indianapolis Motor Speedway, May 30.

The flying getaway of the big field of cars in the 500-mile race is regarded as the most spectacular event in sports each year. The largest crowd to witness any sporting event each year attends the Indianapolis classic which was first run in 1911.

With indications that there will be at least sixty nominations for the race, all save the forty fastest cars will be eliminated in a series of qualifying trials to be run the week before the race.

Pulled the Trigger.

Fun Body Through Ice.

"John didn't move, but the car ran into the ditch and stopped. I could see some lights coming and I was afraid somebody would see that he was dead, so I dragged him around back of the car and fastened him by the leg to the bumper with a tire chain. Then I drove away back in the stubble field and turned out my lights."

Anton said that he unfastened the chain in the field and loaded the body into the back seat of the car. Then, when the approaching car had passed, he drove out of the field and over to highway 10, from which a small side road took him to a river landing. He drove a mile up the river on the ice to a spot where he knew a hole was kept open to water teams.

With a pole kept there for the purpose, he broke the thin ice on the water hole and pushed his brother's body head first into the river. He pointed out the place and at the first lunge with a long pole, a deputy sheriff brought up the body. John Riske had been shot in the right temple.

Anton went home and wiped out the car with rags. He hid the bloody rags, including his handkerchief, under the hay in the barn, with one of John's oxfords which had come off in the car. He put his brother blood-stained overalls in the house.

Then the slayer wrote a note and signed his brother's name, saying that John had gone away with another fellow and would never return. He addressed it to his mother and she found it the next day.

When Joseph Olaszewski, seven, ran home to his father and said that somebody had been killed on the road Adam Olaszewski put him off with the remark that a dog probably had been hit. The boy, however, was so excited and so insistent that the father finally went with him to the spot. He trailed the bloody circle through the field and remembered that he had seen the lights of a car there the night before.

Olaszewski picked up pieces of brain tissue and brought them here to Dr. Carl Von Neupert, county physician who said at once that they were human tissue.

Discover Bloodstains.

The discovery led to rumors that Mrs. Riske had been killed. Only two farms are on that road, the Riske and the Olaszewski places. Officers went to the Riske home and found Mrs. Riske there. She said that everybody was all right on her farm except that John had gone away.

Anton was taken from a wood-cutting job and questioned. He said that he had taken John over to a neighbor's place but the officers found that this neighbor had left for northern Wisconsin the day before. Then Anton said that John had gone to a dance with the car and must have got into a fight because the car was bloody.

County authorities were thoroughly suspicious of Anton by this time and they went to the Riske farm again for a thorough search. This time they discovered blood at the pump and the things hidden in the barn. The seats of John's car were found to have been saturated with blood.

When Anton was confronted with this evidence, he confessed.

IN MEMORIAM

FRANK SCHOLES

Frank Scholes, son of Nelson and Mary Ann Scholes died at his home in St. Joe, Indiana, May 21, having reached the age of 75 years, 5 months and 11 days. He married Susan I. Deltrick, October 13, 1881, and to them were born two sons and five daughters: Mrs. Henry Dehner of Decatur; Mrs. Robert Ulm of Butler; Mrs. A. E. Erickson of Garrett; Mrs.

Emmet Epler and Mrs. Herman C. Kessler of St. Joe; Clark Scholes of Madison, and Jay Scholes, deceased. Mrs. Scholes is still living in St. Joe.

Mr. Scholes was a successful teacher in the public schools both before and after his graduation from Valparaiso Normal College, in which institution he was one of the earlier students. He qualified there for civil engineering and engaged in that profession continuously, after ceasing to teach. In his professional career he occupied responsible positions in Allen and DeKalb counties, and did extensive public and corporation work in many different sections of the country. His professional work afforded him a diversified experience and helped him to understand and appreciate men.

From early manhood Frank was a Christian, one of many converts in the efficient ministry of John H. Coburn, pioneer preacher of the Disciples of Christ, then preaching at Coburn's Corners. Frank served acceptably in all official positions of the Sunday School and church, and upon several occasions preached impressively for the brethren in Newville and Coburn's Corners. His professional work afforded him frequent opportunities to worship with the larger congregations, where he became acquainted with leading laymen and ministers of the brotherhood. He was also an intelligent reader, and was always well informed on the vital movements of the church. He was a splendid thinker, generous in his judgment of others, liberal in his church views and faithful in personal service. In his passing the family lost a faithful and affectionate father, and the community lost a constant and efficient friend.

His funeral, conducted by the Rev. J. O. Rose, was on May 23, at the residence in St. Joe, and his burial was in Alton Cemetery, under the direction of E. R. Kinsey.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to thank all who sympathized, or aided during the long illness of our husband and father, Mrs. Frank Scholes and Family.

SUMMARY OF ASSESSMENT REPORTS MADE

Automobiles and trucks in DeKalb county number 6,478, according to a report compiled by County Assessor Chas. E. Miser from the records of the township assessors recently filed.

These vehicles are assessed for taxation at an average of $167, or a total of $996,490. The total is about $100,000 less than a year ago, owing to the decrease in the number of new cars.

Mr. Miser also reports that a total of $1,033,660 in cash on hand or in bank was assessed, an increase of $160,000 over a year ago; but the total valuation of diamonds assessed is only $17,300. The number of assessments of household goods is 5,586, for a total $1,130,450, an average of $202. The average is $18 less than last year.

Farm implements assessed totaled $224,919, an average of $148, which is about the same as a year ago. The assessment of horses varied little, there being 3,652 of them for a total of $285,337, an average of $78. There are 147 of them assessed, the total amount being $11,187. The number of cows, 7,085, is 2,500 less than a year ago. The total assessment is $350,360, an average of $49, a loss of $11 as compared with 1930. Other cattle number 6,106, assessed for $130,930, an average of $25.

The sheep assessed this spring number 14,290, averaging $6, or a total of $91,615. This is only half the assessment last year on practically the same number.

The 3,000 sows in the county are assessed for $80,320, the average being $26. This is a loss of 1,100 sows as compared with 1930, when the average assessment was $30. Other hogs number 9,600, assessed for $67,627, an average of $7. The number shows a loss of 4,000 within the last year, although the average is about the same. The assessors appraised 12,023 dozens of poultry at $72,640, an average of $7 a dozen. The average is $1 lower than a year ago.

The items assessed include 492 tractors, valued for taxation at $48,215, an average of $159. The assessors listed the county's stocks of merchandise for $808,190, a loss of $20,000. The average is $2,624.

BALANCED DAIRY RATIONS ON GRASS IMPROVES EFFICIENCY OF COWS

(By Prof. W. B. Krueck)

The ability of dairy cattle to absorb such minerals as calcium and phosphorus does not seem to respond to the same treatments that apply in other classes of animals.

We know that exposure of a great many animals and human beings to the ultra-violet rays of the sun seems to influence the assimilation of the mineral elements of the ration and thereby maintain a proper mineral balance in the animal. However, with dairy cows, especially heavy producing cows in the early part of their lactation period, little benefit has been obtained in the assimilation of calcium and phosphorus by exposure of ultra-violet rays or to direct sunlight.

On the other hand, towards the end of the lactation period and especially where cows are out on good pasture, they seem to have the ability to absorb calcium and phosphorus and build up the mineral balance in their systems provided sufficient minerals are supplied in the ration.

In a great many cases dairy cattle have been forced to depend entirely upon pasture during the summer months. Supplementing these pastures with a reasonable supply of concentrates properly balanced with good protein and some calcium and phosphorus will help to maintain a more nearly perfect physical condition on the dairy cow and thereby enable her to go into the fall season ready for her winter's work in better condition.

If the greatest efficiency is to be obtained with any machine, that machine must be kept in as nearly perfect condition as possible at all times. The dairyman has made of the dairy cow a milk manufacturing machine. Therefore, he should aim to keep this machine in as nearly perfect physical condition as possible.

WITNESS TRAGIC DEATH

Four Local Persons See Wm. G. Baltz Drive on Tracks in the Path of Fast B.O. Train

CAR CARRIED QUARTER MILE
Instant Death was the Result.
Was on Way to St. Joe to Do Some Trading.

Possibly the most tragic death in years in this community, was that of William Baltz, when he was instantly killed Thursday afternoon by a fast B. & O. east bound passenger train, due here at 2:20.

Mr. Baltz was on his way to St. Joe and he failed to see the approaching train or the flashing signals, as he deliberately drove his Ford Coupe into the path of the train.

The body was thrown 150 feet east of the west end crossing and lay against the north track. Every bone in his body was broken and much of his skull was missing. The car was scattered along the track for a quarter of a mile and the chassis was deposited on the north track near the depot.

There were eye witnesses to the accident. Mrs. George Kees was looking out her north window when she saw Mr. Baltz drive on the track. Mrs. George Tustison and Mrs. Byron Woodcock had just crossed the crossing, going north when they saw the train coming. Mr. Baltz passed them north of the tracks and did not seem to slow up any, so they stopped to see whether or not he was going to cross, and as soon as they were lighted from their car, he was struck. Walter Baker, of Spencer, was at the Benninghoff Corner and witnessed the tragedy.

The marks on the crossing would indicate that the car was about centered on the north rail of the east bound track, and was not on the track so that it could be seen by the engineer, J. A. Walter.

The train stopped near the Bear Creek bridge east of town, but did not discover that they had struck a car until J. H. Leighty, who lived near went to see what the trouble was and he saw the car door on the pilot of the engine. Steam was escaping from the cylinder, because the pet cock had been knocked off in the crash, and the fireman was putting in a fire at the time, and when he got back in the cab, he noticed the escape and the engineer stopped to see what was causing the trouble. The train backed up to St. Joe and conductor E. A. Beeber and his brakeman began to investigate the accident and getting names of the witnesses and arranging for the section men and agent Mr. Young to look after the matter.

Conductor Beeber remarked that in his 37 years of service, that his train had had but one accident before and that happened on Tuesday at Deshler.

Grant, the only son, was working near the elevator at the time of the accident and the section saw what had happened and Grant said that the fender brace made him think of his father's car, and in a short time Clarence Hart came down the track and told him that it was his father who had been killed.

Only a few minutes before the accident Mr. Baltz had returned from Butler where he bought some baby chicks, and had talked with Hollis Dilley, and he said he had to go to St. Joe and get some feed. He evidently had this on his mind and had forgotten about the time of the train.

DuWayne Kinsey was called and took charge of the body until his father returned home from Fort Wayne.

The entire community was grieved over the sad accident and many sight seers were here during the evening to witness the wreckage.

OBITUARY

William Henry Baltz, son of John and Mary Baltz, was born in Sandusky County, Ohio, February 4, 1860 and departed this life May 28, 1931, aged 71 years, 3 months and 24 days.

His parents were sturdy German people who came to this country in the days before the Civil War. They settled in the state of Maryland moving from there to Ohio, thence to Spencer, Indiana, where the deceased spent the greater part of his young manhood.

About forty-two years ago he moved to the farm north of St. Joe where he spent the remainder of his life.

On January 26, 1882 he was united in marriage to Malissie Engle, to which union was born five children, four girls and one boy.

He was preceded in death by his wife who died October 8, 1897 and one daughter, Frankie Saylor, who died January 31, 1921.

Of the two families of Baltz's who moved to Indiana in an early day he was the last of his generation.

Mr. Baltz was a good neighbor and will be missed by his friends.

He leaves to mourn the following children: Mrs. Clyde Hart of Spencer; Mrs. Arthur Pinkerton, of Bryan, Ohio; Mrs. Clinton Webb, of Montgomery, Mich.; and Grant Baltz, of St. Joe. Nine grandchildren and one great grandchild.

The funeral was held from the Kinsey Funeral Home Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock, conducted by Rev. G. D. Stoll, and interment was made in Riverside Cemetery.

SPLENDID MEMORIAL DAY SERVICES

Memorial Day always brings guests from afar, and this year, in spite of the inclement weather, many came to decorate the graves of their loved ones, to pay homage to the veterans who have passed on and to call on old friends of the community. Among them were Mrs. Bessie Tustison, of Springfield, Ohio, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Patterson and Mr. and Mrs. George Bartlett of Fort Wayne; Miss Sake Bartlett, of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Langley and Mrs. Alice Warner, of Auburn; Mrs. Ray Sailer and son, of Chicago; besides many others.

Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Funk, of near Butler, were present. Mr. Funk is a Spanish-American veteran, and it has been his custom to attend these services for many years.

The services of the forenoon were held at the high school gym, and this was the first time that a Civil War Veteran was absent, in fact they have all passed away, but in their stead we now call upon the Legion members, and with the Squad from Auburn participating there were fourteen present.

Six members of the Girls Glee Club furnished the music and the young ladies did splendid. Their willingness to take charge of this part of the program is appreciated. Their music consisted of three numbers: "America the Beautiful," "The Vacant Chair," and last the "Star Spangled Banner."

Fred Thomas did himself justice in his interesting address. The day is two fold, and he first dwelt on the sorrow of the occasion and then the gratitude of the American people and what patriotism really meant.

The line of march was in charge of Roy Maxwell, which was headed by the color bearers, firing squad, Legion members, children and citizens. Through the drizzling rain the procession made its way to the cemetery where the graves were decorated with wreaths. The formation about the monument, the firing squad shot three volleys and the dismissal was offered by Rev. Thomas.

The cemetery was beautiful from every angle, the graves all bore flowers of some description, flags were fluttering in the breeze and the rain drops gave the grass a beautiful green color.

Mrs. Kees takes pride in her flowers and the public is always welcome to look about her garden. Mrs. Frank Scholes also has a wonderful garden of a mixed variety of flowers and delights in entertaining visitors.

AUTO ASSOCIATION NOW IN SESSION

Thos. P. Henry, President of the American Automobile Association, presided at the Annual Meeting which convened at 10:00 Wednesday morning, at West Baden, Ind., with the Hoosier Association as hosts. Policies guiding the National Motoring Body will be decided at this meeting and officers for the ensuing year will be elected. The organization was formed in 1902 and since that time it has been the organized representative of the automobile owners in this country.

Problems affecting the motorists' interests will be up before the convention for analysis and means of solving. Attention will also be given to the further development of standardized service so that a membership card of a motorist of a Three A. Club in Indiana means just as much to him throughout the United States and Canada and with affiliations abroad as it does here at home.

Cheese Toast After Tiresome Trip

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

You've been out for an all-day or all afternoon motor trip. Perhaps the whole family was included, and you've all returned hungry, somewhat tired, and a little chilly. You want something appetizingly hot that can be made ready in a jiffy. The speed with which a pick-up meal of this kind can be produced depends, of course, on your previous preparations. A good nucleus for it would be cheese toast which can be almost entirely prepared before the ride, accompanied by cocoa, reheated, or quickly made tea or percolator coffee, or a hot broth of some sort. The bureau of home economics gives the following directions for making cheese toast with plain American cheese:

1 lb. cheese a few grains of cayenne pepper
1 cup rich milk or cream
1/2 cup onion juice
1/2 cup flour mixed
1/2 cup water
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. baking powder
4 drops tobacco, or powder

Shave the cheese into thin small pieces. Heat the milk or cream in a double boiler, thicken with the flour which has been mixed with the water, and cook for five minutes. Add a small amount of this mixture to the beaten eggs, return to the double boiler, add the cheese, and the seasonings. Cook slowly and stir constantly until the cheese has melted and the mixture is thick and creamy. Allow it to cool, then add the baking powder.

Toast one side of the bread. Spread the cheese mixture thickly on the untoasted side to the very edge. If the cheese mixture does not come to the edges of the bread, they become brown and hard. Brown the cheese delicately, under a low gas flame or in the oven. The slow heat allows the cheese mixture to heat through before it browns, gives it a chance to become light, and keeps the cheese tender and soft. Too great heat makes the cheese tough and stringy. If desired, place a strip of crisp bacon across each slice of cheese toast. Serve it hot from the oven. This recipe makes enough for 12 to 14 slices of bread. The cheese mixture may be prepared except for the baking powder—the day before it is to be used. Since the mixture stiffens on standing, heat until soft in a double boiler, let it cool, and add the baking powder. Then spread the cheese on the toast.

Cosmetics Long in Use

The knowledge of cosmetics dates back to remote antiquity and their annals comprise the history of the folly, luxury and extravagance of past ages. The number of simple and compound substances employed as perfumes is incalculable and almost fabulous and the books written by Egyptians, Greeks and Romans on the subject almost constituted a library in themselves.

Firmness and Gentleness

It is only people who possess firmness who can possess true gentleness. In those who appear gentle, it is generally only weakness, which is rapidly converted into harshness.—Rochefort.

Correct Posture Important When Sitting

A Slouching Sitting Posture Induces Fatigue.

Good Sitting Posture.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Did you ever catch yourself sitting in a slovenly way while you peeled the vegetables or finished other seated work when you felt "just dead tired"? The farm woman in the first illustration gives one an impression of discouragement and fatigue entirely out of proportion to the simple task she is engaged in. Notice how her head, shoulders, and abdomen are slouched forward, while her feet, rather tensely wound around each other, will soon add to the general weariness induced by her bad posture. Perhaps she has been "on her feet" a long time; she has slung herself down to start dinner by peeling the potatoes, erroneously believing that she is relaxing her muscles. In reality, she may be giving them some bad training.

She would feel much better if she sat well back in her chair, letting the spindles support the lower end of her spine, with her feet firmly on the floor and her shoulder blades flat. As nearly as possible her head should follow the line of her spine, so she will lean forward slightly to see what she is doing without straining. This enables her to keep her abdomen back instead of slouching forward, and results in much less fatigue than the other position.

Farm women in Hampshire county, Massachusetts, made studies of correct posture for doing various household tasks, under the direction of the home demonstration agent. The photographs were taken by the United States Department of Agriculture. The group studied correct and incorrect posture for dishwashing, mopping floors, handling food at the oven, writing a letter and various other activities that occur very frequently in the ordinary household routine.

Black Is Relieved With White

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Black relieved with much white is an outstanding call of both the evening and the daytime mode. In answer to this plea of fashion for striking contrast comes from the atelier of Jeanne Lanvin a stunning two-piece formal evening dress as illustrated. It is made of black satin for the skirt, with a sleeveless blouse which is of white satin. In this instance the satin is of the supple crepe persuasion which adds to the elegance of its appearance.

The belt which is posed at the normal waistline is decorative in that it is made of milliner folds of the satin which have been braided together. The skirt is smartly styled with a full hemline. It took ten seams-together goes of the satin to accomplish the snug fit about the hipline which every style-wise woman so covets this season.

The fact that this costume is made of satin is very significant in that it announces a continued favor for this material among the haute couture of Paris, which of course means that we in America have grown definitely satin-conscious. So all-prevailing is the present favor for satin, it extends from the region of smart sports costumes on and on through a versatile afternoon program culminating with a repertoire of formal evening gowns whose superb technique is expressed in intricate and ingenious seamings which leads to lines of utmost grace and distinction.

Before concluding our remarks about the prestige accorded satin in the mode we would like to call attention to the fact that washable satin has been launched for the summer spectator sports frock. Tailored to a nicety are these smart one-piece types. Then, too, the costume which poses a white satin jacket over a dark skirt for daytime wear registers among chic fashions of the hour.

And how a word about the two-piece movement which the evening mode has borrowed from the daytime style program. It's the latest, this idea of a skirt of one color, contrasted with a sleeveless blouse of another, for formal dine and dance wear.

Food Hints of Interest to All

By NELLIE MAXWELL

Failure in a sense, the high-water mark of success, is every discovery of the false leads us to seek earnestly after what is true, and every fresh experience points out some form of error which we shall afterward carefully avoid.—John Keats.

When making gravy without browned flour, add the flour to the fat and stir until well blended, then add the liquid and a teaspoonful of caramel to give the gravy a little more brown color.

Molasses Biscuit.—Mix and sift two and one-half cups of pastry flour with one-half teaspoonful each of soda and salt, one-eighth teaspoonful each of ginger and cinnamon, a grating of nutmeg. Three tablespoons of shortening are now added, and when well mixed add three-eighths of a cupful of buttermilk and three tablespoons of molasses. Pat half an inch thick and cut with a small cutter. Bake in a hot oven ten minutes. These are served with butter and marmalade.

Lemon Tarts.—Make a rich pastry and bake in fancy-shaped tins about two inches deep. Crimp the edges of the crust and fill with the following: Mix four tablespoons of cornstarch with one-half cupful of cold water and add to one and one-half cups of boiling water, stir and cook until thick. Beat the yolks of four eggs, add two cups of sugar, one tablespoonful of butter, the juice of three lemons and the grated rind of one. Cook over water until smooth and thick enough to stand up in points when stirred with a spoon. Fill the shells and cover with the egg white beaten stiff with five tablespoons of sugar added. Bake in a moderate oven until a delicate, crisp brown.

Mock Duck.—Take a two-pound steak two inches thick and split to hold the dressing. Season well on the inside with salt and pepper. For the dressing take two cups of toasted crumbs, two slices of dried cooked bacon, one-half teaspoonful of salt and pepper to taste, add one egg slightly beaten, two, chopped onions, a half teaspoonful of sugar, a bit of garlic and one-half cupful of water or any good broth. Stuff the steak and tie securely with a string. Sear all over until brown. Cook in a Dutch oven slowly until tender.

Lamb Aspic.—Make a highly seasoned soup stock of vegetables, broth or beef extract, using a package of gelatin for each quart of stock, stir until the gelatin is well dissolved. Blend a mold in cold water and pour in a layer of the aspic, keeping the remainder warm. When the jelly is congealed but not hard, cover with thin slices of cold roast lamb and sprinkle with a little mint sauce or spread with the above jelly. Cover with the aspic and repeat, leaving the aspic on top. Set away to harden.

Convenience Is Needed in the Kitchen

Work Centers Well Placed in Farm Kitchen.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Expensive kitchen equipment is not necessary to make the room convenient to work in. It is more important to place each of the major work centers in the best relation to the others so that the usual kitchen tasks follow each other in logical order. Then the homemaker does not have to cross her own path repeatedly, taking many unnecessary steps, in doing her work.

Here is a farm kitchen photographed by the United States Department of Agriculture. It is furnished inexpensively, but it is very convenient because careful thought has been given to its arrangement. Light and cross ventilation are provided by windows on two adjoining walls.

This kitchen has only a plain iron sink, which is not ideal, but suffices at the present. It has running water from a home-made water system, but not running hot water. However, the stove, only a few steps from the sink, has a "water back" or hot water tank, and this arrangement is fairly satisfactory. There is a double drain-board at the sink, and splendid light. The best height for the sink has been considered, as its level is somewhat above that of the table.

The kitchen table has a highly varnished top for easy cleaning. Built-in closets above it take care of food supplies and dishes. The homemaker has a high stool and a comfortable location for sitting at her work. Farther around the room, the woodbox is close to the stove and of such a height that it can be used like a window seat.

Oatmeal Muffins Are Nice for Breakfast

The best surprises in the breakfast menu for most of us lie in having a different kind of breadstuff. Biscuits or muffins or popovers instead of plain toast, and, among the muffins, there are graham, whole wheat, bran, oatmeal, cornmeal, and many fruited and nutted kinds from which to choose. Here's a simple recipe from the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture for oatmeal muffins that every one is sure to like:

1 cup fine rolled oats 1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup sifted flour 1 egg
1/2 cup milk 1/2 cup melted fat
4 tsp. baking powder 1 tbs. melted fat

Mix the dry ingredients. Beat the egg slightly, add the milk, and stir with the melted fat into the dry mixture. Bake in greased muffin pans in a moderately hot oven (400 degrees Fahrenheit) for 25 to 30 minutes.

Evening Fairy Tale for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

FLY-HIGH

Now Fly-High, you know, is the special bird of the elves. He has a great red body and enormous black wings.

"Come, Fly-High," called Elfe Elf. And from somewhere—no one could hardly tell where—Fly-High swooped down into Elfland.

"Here I am," said Fly-High. For as Fly-High is only a bird of Elfland he can talk, and very often he explains the trips the elves take.

"Hurray!" shouted Elfe Elf. "You came so quickly. We want to see our cousins, the members of the elf family."

"Will you take us to Elfland?"

"By all means," said Fly-High.

"Shall we start right away?" asked all the elves.

"I am ready," said Fly-High. "I am just anxious for a good fly. I want to stretch my wings and feel the wind against them."

"And I want to feel all the little elves on my back."

"That's our wondrous Fly-High," said the elves, dancing happily about.

"But, Fly-High, do you suppose there would be room on your back for the members of the Bogey family and the Gnomes? A great many of them want to go with us."

"Do you think you could manage us all?"

"Certainly, certainly, by all means," said Fly-High. "Let's be off."

So all the elves and a great many of the gnomes and Bogeys climbed on Fly-High's back, and his broad black wings spread way out until every little creature had a fine, soft, feathery seat.

"We're off at last," said Fly-High.

"And let's go quickly," said the elves.

They flew along so very quickly, and as they flew they passed by birds who were chirping and singing.

The birds were not frightened by the enormous size of Fly-High, for they knew he was the bird of Elfland, and that he would never do them any harm.

At last they all reached the spot where the members of the Oaf family were.

All the family joined in the trip and a wonderful, wonderful trip they had.

At the end of it the members of the Oaf family asked the Elves to send around word once more that there were no dangerous, naughty little creatures among the Oaf family.

So many untrue stories had gone around about them, and the Elves promised.

In fact they wanted to see the members of the Oaf family particularly this time to ask them if they didn't want those messages to go around again.

"And tell them that not a single member of the Bogey family would hurt them," said the members of the Bogey family.

"To a crowd of creatures to say we'll catch children. We wouldn't hurt a single child for anything in the world—whether good or naughty."

And the Elves knew this was true.

REGULAR PAINS

The modern Miss needs no "time out" for the time of month.

If you've ever taken Bayer Aspirin for a headache, you know how soon the pain subsides. It is just as effective in the relief of those pains peculiar to women!

Don't dedicate certain days of every month to suffering. It's old-fashioned. It's unnecessary. Aspirin will always enable you to carry-on in comfort. Take enough to assure you complete comfort. If it is genuine Aspirin it cannot possibly hurt you. Bayer Aspirin does not depress the heart. It does nothing but stop the pain, so use it freely.

Headaches come at inconvenient times. So do colds. But a little Bayer Aspirin will always save the day. Neuralgia. Neuritis. Rheumatism. Pains that once kept people home are forgotten half an hour after taking a few of these remarkable tablets. So are the little nagging aches that bring fatigue and "nerves" by day or a sleepless night.

Genuine Bayer Aspirin tablets cost so very little after all, that it doesn't pay to experiment with imitations!

Cows Don't Pay NOW

Our records for the 1930-31 testing year show that we milked an average of 9.8 cows for the year. They produced 65,822 pounds of milk, 3361.5 pounds of butter fat which had a total value of $1,570.14. Feed cost amounted to $666.75 leaving a profit over feed cost of $903.39—$92.00 per cow. This record included two 8r. yearlings and two two-year olds which materially reduced the average of the mature cows.

Save Them

Trees with cavities, safe refuges of the small hunted wild animals, are the "fur" or "den" trees. Affording shelter to the small animal, the den tree is very important to its life, for when the animal is taken and the den destroyed nothing is left there to protect another animal, says the American Forestry association.

Avoid Complaint

Complain as little as possible of the wrongs done you; for, commonly speaking, he who complains sins, because self-love always makes us believe the injuries done to us greater than they really are. —Francis de Sales.

NEW MILLINERY SPEAKS FOR MOST PART IN TERMS OF STRAW

IN DISCUSSING millinery as it is and will be, for this spring and summer, one must speak, for the most part, in terms of straw, for the straw hat in its multiple interpretations is far out-selling any other type. No matter what sort of straw, just so it's straw is apparently the theory being put into practice.

Fine milans are as important as rough novelty straws. Formal hats of sheer lacy bodies are likewise given promotion and as for the bakus and the tojo panamas, the panamaliques and such, they are as exotic and as plentiful as ever.

Straws of glazing high luster contrast those with no luster at all. As for color, straws have gone riotous. Black and navy comes first generally relieved with white or light blue. Then there's brown which is the dernier cri for spring. Emphasis is also placed on striking contrast, such as white straw interwoven with black celophane, or in tri-color effect as black, white and red, orange, brown and pale beige, navy, white and gray, the latter an especial favorite with smart Parisiennes at the present moment.

Just as thrilling are the shapes of the new chapeaux. Crowns are different, being that shallow they set the hat way back on the head. And brims! Well, what's coming in the way of flatter and versatile brims words fail to describe. There is this much we know, the hat with a bandeau which tucks the brim in a Watteau leads in the race at the present moment.

The little hat at the top to the right is a Watteau. It lifts its brim enough to reveal a flower-trimmed bandeau. The cloche to the left is a baku in natural color. A cluster of green, red and blue soft quills on the bandeau take the place of flowers.

In order to place the accent on its facing of blue grosgrain ribbon, the brim of the hat centered to the right in the picture rolls back, revealing also its ribbon-trimmed bandeau.

Quiet as a Dutch maiden's bonnet is the black lace straw dress hat which concludes this group of ultra modish headwear.

One of the most familiar stories of Athenian history is that of Aristides and the peasant, says an article in a Boston paper. The ancient Athenians were just as human as any other people of later times, despite our tendency to regard them as supermen. Aristides, it will be remembered, was a great and good man whose policy was opposed to that of the brilliant and unscrupulous Themistocles.

The deadlock between the two leaders had to be broken by ostracism, which provided for the temporary banishment of the less popular leader. A peasant accosted Aristides and asked him to write the name of Aristides on his ballot. This was a vote for banishment and the leader asked the peasant if Aristides had ever injured him. "No," the man answered, "but I am tired of hearing him called Aristides the just."

The Plains of Abraham

By James Oliver Curwood

One lives in imagination the days of romance and peril in which English and French were struggling for mastery of the American continent—a period of strong characters in which the Indians and hardy frontiersmen furnished personalities no less striking than those of the titled adventurers who plotted with and against them. A powerful story.

JESUS IN GETHSEMANE

GOLDEN TEXT—Saying, Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me: nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done.

LESSON TEXT—Luke 22:39-54.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus in the Garden.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus in the Garden.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Obeying God at Any Cost.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Meaning of Gethsemane.

I. Jesus at the Mount of Olives. (v. 39).

He went from the upper room under cover of the night to the Garden of Gethsemane, a favorite resort on the slope of the Mount of Olives, a short distance east of Jerusalem (Matt. 26:30). It is a place where the oil-presses were used for food and lighting. The bruising and crushing of Christ in this Garden has yielded the largest blessings to the world.

II. His Companions. (vv. 39, 40).

Peter, James and John, who had been with him on the Mount of Transfiguration, were permitted to go with him into the deep shadows of the Garden (Matt. 26:37). He took those who were best able to apprehend the meaning of the tragic hour to be his sympathizing companions. This was needed to prepare them as his witnesses. Knowing the peculiar trial through which they would soon pass when the Shepherd should be smitten, he needed to prepare them for it. They needed to taste the bitter cup of which he drank and of which they, too, later should drink.

III. Jesus Praying. (vv. 41-44).

1. Withdrawal from the disciples (v. 41). Even these members of the inner circle could not now go with him. He tore himself away from them, for he must be alone in this darkest hour. He knelt down and prayed.

2. What he said (v. 42). "If thou be willing, remove this cup from me."

The cup did not mean primarily the physical sufferings of the cross, though they were included in it. He did not now desire to escape from the cross and thus to stop short of his redemptive work, for this was the supreme purpose of his coming into the world (Heb. 2:14). He was so completely identified with a sinning race that the judgment of a holy God which rightfully would be fallen upon it was about to strike him—the Father's face was actually turned from him. The cup, therefore, meant his death as the bearer of sin. He came to Gethsemane with the full knowledge of what it meant, and consciously brought his human will into accord with the divine will. He bowed in submission to the Father's will. So great was his agony that he sweat, as it were, great drops of blood. In this crucial hour an angel from heaven strengthened him. He won the victory in submission to his Father's will, and from henceforth went with unfaltering steps to the cross.

IV. The Disciples Sleeping. (vv. 45, 46).

They had boasted of their fidelity (Matt. 26:35), but could not watch with him for an hour. He had issued a word of warning to them (Luke 22:34), but they were so benumbed with sorrow that they failed to keep awake. He gently reprimanded them and commended that they should arise and pray lest they enter into temptation.

V. Jesus Betrayed. (vv. 47, 48).

1. The betrayer (v. 47). It was Judas, one of the twelve. He had enjoyed the most intimate relations with the Lord; eating with him, listening to his teaching, witnessing his marvelous miracles, and enjoying his countenance. These privileges intensify the horror of the deed. He even guided the mob to arrest Jesus.

2. The sign of betrayal (v. 47). It was a kiss, the token of the most tender affection and friendship.

3. Jesus' tender words to him (v. 48). These words to the infamous disciple reveal the infinite tenderness of the Lord's heart. Many professing disciples today are proving their disloyalty to Jesus and even are betraying him. All who bear the name of Christ, and especially ministers and teachers, who deny the virgin birth, deity, and vicarious atonement of Jesus Christ, are following in the footsteps of Judas.

VI. Jesus Arrested. (v. 54).

The multitude led by Judas invaded the sacred precincts of the Garden and arrested Jesus and brought him before the High Priest. Peter followed him afar off. Peter's downfall may be traced to his self-confidence.

Faith a Necessity.

There is only one door into heaven; that door is faith. There is only one ship that sails for the skies; her name is Faith. There is only one weapon with which to contend with opposition; that weapon is faith.—Talmage.

A Great Mistake.

There is no greater mistake than to suppose that Christians can impress the world by compromising with it.—Selected.

SAXONY'S 'LITTLE PARIS'

Clock Peddler in Streets of Leipzig.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

LEIPZIG, metropolis of Saxony and fifth city of Germany, is best known to the world because of its famous commodity fairs; but it is a center of learning and culture as well as of commerce. Its university is one of the most famous in Germany, attracting many students from abroad.

Many quaint gabled houses dating from medieval days are still to be found in narrow side streets of the old city; and there are museums, theaters, and lecture halls of which any metropolis might be proud. The fair visitor with a taste for literature, music or art, will not be at a loss for ways of spending his leisure hours in Saxony's "Little Paris," as its inhabitants were once fond of calling the city.

Like Berlin, Vienna and other European cities, Leipzig has added variety to the sword-into-plowshares legend by raising its old battlefields into boulevards. Its Ring-Strasse, where grim walls rose once, surrounds the old city in the center of which is the fair market. To the east is the fine Book Exchange building which annually attracts hundreds of publishers.

Leipzig is the publishing center of Germany. More than 500 periodicals are published there. That it is also a publishing center for all Europe is seen in the fact that 11,000 publishers have representatives in Leipzig.

It is, in fact, one of the outstanding publishing centers of the world.

On the edge of town, almost on the battle site where Napoleon's defeat in the battle of the nations foreshadowed Waterloo, is the university. Many Americans have studied medicine and other subjects in these halls made famous by Goethe. Tourists today are shown Auerbach's beer cellar where Goethe, the student, made merry and drew inspiration for Faust from old mural paintings. A hidden door discloses an underground passage from the beer cellar leading directly to an old university building.

Nearby on the same street where Goethe wooed is a simple tablet in a wall with the inscription: "In this house was born Richard Wagner, May 22, 1813."

Although Leipzig can point to no cathedral, it has as fine a musical and literary tradition as any town in the Reich. Bach, who is the composers' composer, much as Spenser is the poets' poet, drilled his choruses in a Leipzig church. With a nucleus of four town pipers who were under municipal contract to play for weddings and festivities, "with patience and without extortion," Bach built up an orchestra. Young Felix Mendelssohn took up the baton of his orchestra and out of it grew the famous Leipzig conservatory. Schumann and the poet Schiller were also attracted to Leipzig, lending it reflected glory.

As a great merchandising and commercial center, Leipzig is a living memorial to the value of good roads. The world has made many paths to Leipzig's door, but the Leipzig philosophy proclaims that good road work is the path to the world coming.

At a date too early to record, Leipzig's predecessor of the modern chamber of commerce decided that a good road between their city and Halle would make more merchants go through Leipzig. Thus the little, village in the broad flat plain, devoid of lake in the broad flat plain, made itself a natural strategic site, made itself a junction point and outstripped its neighbor villages. Descendants of that early chamber of commerce completed a union railroad station in Leipzig in 1913 that has a facade 1,000 feet long.

The fact that trade fairs of some sort have been held annually for 700 years in Leipzig, emphasizes at once the age of this method of carrying on trade, and the changes that have been made under modern conditions of mass production, and wide distribution.

Fairs, as devices through which to dispose of goods, were in use in Europe during the early centuries of the Christian era, and became important in the Middle Ages. It was then that two of the most outstanding fairs of today took shape, that at Lyons, France, and that at Leipzig, Germany.

The latter dates from about 1170. One of the best known fairs, that at Nizhni Novgorod, Russia, was not founded until the Seventeenth century, but since that time it has been of great importance to the diversified peoples from the Orient, who gathered there to exchange their wares.

"Goods Fairs" at First.

These and the many similar fairs that existed in Europe were at first "goods fairs," to which were brought great quantities of the actual goods to be bartered or sold.

Leipzig's importance as a goods market town really had its beginning in the Fifteenth century when Emperor Maximilian conferred a monopoly upon it. Other places in the region were forbidden to hold fairs at all. As a result of this simple expedient the former trading village leaped at a bound into first place in local commerce. There were periods of black depression during various wars of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth centuries, but Leipzig's central situation in middle Europe always attracted fresh material for commercial reconstruction.

After railroads criss-crossed Europe and "sample runners" (the European version of "drummers" or commercial salesmen) were sent out in increasing numbers by manufacturers, the goods fairs were no longer necessary in the commercial scheme of things. A number of the old fairs went out of existence under these conditions. Others, notably the Leipzig and Lyons fairs, modified their methods and have become of even more importance.

Instead of assembling goods in great warehouses for sale, fairs now bring together hundreds and thousands of articles as samples. Would-be buyers come from all parts of the world, examine the samples, confidently accept the word of agents that goods furnished by factories will be as represented, and place their orders.

The rise of the sample fair has been most pronounced since the World War. Among leading ones now operating in addition to those at Leipzig and Lyons, are fairs at Paris, London, Birmingham, Vienna, Prague, Gutenberg, Salonic and Valencia, to mention only a few.

While some modern sample fairs deal with a practically unlimited variety of products, others specialize in certain classifications. Leipzig is probably the greatest of the broad fairs.

Varied Collections.

Goods exhibited at Leipzig are even more varied than the people who come to buy and sell. Toys from Nuremberg and Thüringen have long been famous. Like London, Leipzig is a center of the fur trade, and furs are much in evidence. Books and magazines add another important category. Almost every article used by civilized man may be ordered from samples exhibited here. There are displays of shoes and leather goods, engines, musical instruments, machinery and office furniture. Porcelain from Czechoslovakia and glassware from Austria are seen and automobiles and electric refrigerators from America.

These various wares are set forth in exhibition halls scattered through the city. Every lane and passage is utilized, creating a labyrinth comparable only to the bazaars of the Baghdad of the Arabian Nights period. A babel of languages rises from excited and perspiring travelers who have come to buy or sell and are now trying to find their way about. Hotels are crowded to garret bedrooms, and Leipzig's railway station, the largest on the continent of Europe, is a hive of activity. Lines run south through Munich to Italy, Austria, and the Balkans, and north through Berlin to Scandinavia. A customer from Stockholm may enter his sleeper, be ferried, car and all, across the Baltic and emerge next day on his home soil.

CHAPTER XIV—Continued

"I know," admitted Aggy a little brokenly. "God forgive me. I'm not meaning anything heartless. But, oh, Rob, he doesn't know this country well. And he's been through such a lot. I'm just beside myself for fear something has happened to the laddie."

"We would soon have heard of it. That's why I'm not worrying about Roberta yet," said Rob sternly. "You're too much of a clucking hen, Aggy. He's a grown man and you can't keep him tied to you."

"I'm not wanting that," asserted Aggy stoutly. "I want him to gang his own gait, but to let me know where he's bound."

Despite his anxiety, Robert MacBeth could not help laughing. "That all you want, Aggy?"

"It's not much, but I do want it. I'll have a wife one of these days," said Rob warningly. "Then where will you be?"

"Well, your girl will have a husband one of these days," retorted Aggy defiantly. "Then where will you be?"

"I don't know." He put his hand on his sister's. "We'll maybe have to stick it out together," he said affectionately.

Aggy sighed. "Maybe. I doubt if either of us will find that so agreeable, unless we can get the youngsters to come often to see us. It's always more exciting when they're about. Let's go in Rob, where there are lights. I'll help you."

A car came swiftly up to the terrace and Roberta helped the obstinate Sir George out. The doctor had not been able to keep him in bed. It had been a remarkably silent journey home. Roberta, filled with anxiety for Sir George, had driven. Sir George's head had been on her shoulder. He leaned heavily against her. He had been saving his breath and his strength for his meeting with the redoubtable Robert MacBeth and Aggy, Rob's sister. Yet, Roberta had never would never have a more thrilling ride than this through the night, with her stranger-husband close to her, dependent on her. There seemed no need of speech between them—yet.

Roberta's firm young arm went around him. She helped him to a chair on the terrace, and as he sank in it, twisted her hands helplessly as she stood looking at him. "You should not stand, not even for a moment! You should be in bed. Oh, what an obstinate man! If Aunt Aggy were to see you now."

"Aggy will have to keep her hands off," said Aggy's grateful stepson. "Roberta, divorce is easy in this country and I'll never hold you—if you want to go."

The girl gave him a swift, flashing look. "Why did you marry me?"

He looked at her in the soft light, for the storm was long since over and the late moon was rising. He laughed. "For just the one reason. I'm mad about every hair in your darling red head. I could spend the rest of my life kissing the dimple in your cheek."

"I want the truth."

"You've had it," said Sir George and kissed the dimple and her mouth. Presently Roberta drew her head back and whispered: "I think I'll stay married to you."

He laughed softly. "You're easily satisfied. I'm still a poor Scot with barren acres and a cold, old stone house."

"And I'm still a red-haired, hateful-tempered—"

"Darling," said Sir George. "Do you think you can help me to the door and face the music?"

"Oh, here you are at last!" Lady Sandison came out on the terrace. "I thought I heard a car. Think shame about leaving your guests to find their way home the best they could, and frightening me and Rob out of our senses."

"Oh, no," said Sir George quickly. "You were not really worrying about us yet, Aggy."

"Was I not?" she came nearer and glanced that Roberta's arm was about Sir George and that his face was white in the moonlight and his head bandaged as well as his foot. She ran to him. "Roberta MacBeth, you heartless girl, what have you been doing to my laddie?"

"Marrying me, Aggy," said her stepson smiling.

"What?"

Robert MacBeth had heard their voices and such was his anxiety had risen from his wheelchair and was slowly hobbling toward them. Roberta, now that Aggy was there to support Sir George, ran to him and put her arms about him. She led him to where Lady Sandison knelt, her arms about her boy.

But Sir George put Aggy aside and held out his hand to Roberta. "She left Robert MacBeth and went to him. 'If we're married, sir, sorry I can't stand up.' Sir George added, sinking back into his chair. 'It was a little sudden, but I trust you won't object very strenuously.'"

"I do," said Robert MacBeth angrily, clutching at a chair to help him stand erect. "I do most strenuously. 'Father!' cried Roberta. 'Wait until you hear why he did it. He wasn't in the least to blame. He did it to save me from a terrible mistake.'"

"Nothing of the kind," declared Sir George indignantly. "I did it because I've been mad about you ever since I first set eyes on you."

"That's the plain truth," declared Lady Sandison. "And it's me that knows it. Let the laddie sit down on this chair, and do you sit down yourself, Rob, before you get all hot and bothered about nothing."

"But not to tell me—" began Robert MacBeth.

"And why should they?" asked Aggy. "Are they not both old enough and do they not know you would have made such a big affair of their wedding that they would have been stone tired of the whole idea before it was over? No, Rob, it was a sensible thing they did and you'll come around to their way of thinking before this night's very old. You should be in bed, Sir George. I'll call August."

"You'll do nothing of the kind. I won't be managed, Aggy," her stepson said doggedly, though he knew he protested in vain, and to the day

"What?"

"It's the most thrilling thing you've ever heard," said Roberta, Lady Sandison, "but we'll have to wait for the Dowager Lady Sandison to come in. She made me promise not to tell it until she joined us."

The Dowager Lady Sandison came into the library with a large tray. She waved aside all assistance and put it on the table near Sir George, and began to arrange it for him.

"I had this ready against your coming," she said with a satisfied air. "You're a pair of poor looking lads," she added surveying the men, "for all that Roberta and I think so much of you."

"This'll put heart in you, my lad. Tell the tale, Lady Sandison."

Roberta, from the arm of her husband's chair, looked at them wide-eyed. "It's the most thrilling thing that ever happened."

"Hear! Hear!" said Sir George. "Hear! Hear! Let's hear the tale of the Dowager Lady Sandison, the most thrilling thing that ever happened."

"I don't know," he put his hand on his sister's. "We'll maybe have to stick it out together," he said affectionately.

MEMORIAL

O day of days! Flower-crowned, bright with the light
Of pride and victory, and yet with half-wild face
And tear-filled eyes, you hold a new significance!
Today, this lovely earth, in all its May-time blossoming,
Bears not enough of tender dew-wet bloom
To cover graves, both old and new, nor strew
The moaning, restless seas in memory
Of our brave dead.

O birds, sing out your gladdest, merriest tunes!
You cannot stir the dead in their long, dreamless sleep.
But you may cheer sad ones who kneel
Beside the graves of loved ones whose loved ones rest
In a far land, where other hands than theirs Must place an offering.

Memory of Older 'Decoration' Day

There was a time, within the memory of those of us who have reached the age of discretion, when Memorial Day was a day of holiday indeed, with lively goings-on to impress its significance upon us. In the morning Main street would blossom out in a magnificent array of red, white and blue, and all through the forenoon there would be a hum in the air that betokened enterprises of great worth and moment; ladies would dart hither and yon carrying great baskets of sandwiches, and horses would trot up the street dragging carryalls full of folk from the country. In the lunch hour there was a lull while the sandwiches were being consumed; but by the zero hour, 2 o'clock in the afternoon, everything was ready and things began to happen.

On the town green assembled the town carpenter, the keeper of the livery stable, the owner of the Acme furniture store, the town constable, the president of the First National bank, the teacher of mathematics in the high school, the driver of the express wagon, the agent at the steamboat wharf and the judge of the Circuit court—prominent old gentlemen all, and on other days of the calendar dignitaries to be greeted respectfully but with no great show of awe. Today, however, they were an air of vast importance; they were togged in blue suits of impressive cut, somehow reminiscent of the pictures in the history book, and they wore hats of the sort affected by the late William Frederick Cody, whereof the crown was adorned with a gold wreath and the letters "G. A. R.," lending a very military appearance to the whole turnout.

Order of March.

These assembled together with many lesser fry also attired in uniforms of various colors and cuts; and presently, after a marshal wearing a red sash had ridden up and down for a while on a black horse, there was a bugle call and the parade assembled. The order of march was as follows:

His Honor the Mayor.
Orpheus Silver Cornet Band.
Grand Army of the Republic.
Water Witch Fire Company.
Semper Parvula Fire Company.
Red Men.
Junior Order United American Mechanics.

Short Pants Brigade (predecessors of the modern Boy Scouts, and every bit as patriotic).

When all these had been formed in line the march to the cemetery began. As to what took place there the memory of most of us will be hazy. Suffice it to say that the exercises, while somewhat puzzling as to their import, were agreeably vociferous, and when they had come to an end we all felt that a great deal had been accomplished. On the way back to town, if there was not a thunder storm, there was a great deal of dust, so that the blue uniforms, so impressive in the afternoon, were by evening the least bit bedraggled.

Younger Folks Take Charge.

Or were they? Perhaps they only seemed so. For by this time the heroes who were then quite forgotten; the evening was given over to a town dance, and the young people were very full of life. Valiantly the veterans tried to hold the limelight. The President of the First National bank walked up to the post office to get his mail, his blue coat changed for a still place; and not one of the girls fluttering through the dusk paid the least bit of attention to him. His comrades stood around on the street corners retelling great stories as inducement to all who would stop and listen; but few stopped and hardly any listened. Their stories had all been heard before, and nobody seemed to see their hats. Occasionally one of them tried a brave buck-and-wing to harmonica accompaniment, but his whoops died quickly as the fiddles tuned up in the town hall.

Civil War's Great Issues.

Now things haven't changed much, except that the young people take charge early in the morning and there doesn't seem to be any time for the old veterans at all. Many a town has not a single Grand Army member left; in the few towns where one or two survive the march to the cemetery is usually omitted, for it has been found that at the age of eighty-five the strain of listening to vociferous exercises may be too much even for a heart that went through Shiloh. Thus the day tends to become more and more a romantic formality, a legal holiday which allows tired citizens to take a trip in the radiator cap. Perhaps this is just as well. For the Civil War is unique among our country's great wars in this respect: the issues which it decided seem remote, fantastic and without application in this day. On the Fourth of July as we listen to the Declaration of Independence the principles which it enunciates seem startlingly close at hand; we rub our eyes and realize that this document of the immortal signatures is very much alive today. On Armistice day, as we listen to the "Fourteen Points," the World War seems almost to be going on yet; these "Fourteen Points" still form the basis of statesmen's deliberations, and how they are to be applied is still a vital matter in many places on the earth. But on Memorial day, as we listen to the Gettysburg speech, everything seems hazy. Union? Slavery? Is it possible that Americans fought over them? Did the great conflict settle anything which would not have settled itself had we been patient enough to wait a little longer?—New York World.

PRESIDENT'S TRIBUTE

President Hoover making stirring address to veterans as part of annual Memorial day ceremonies.

Service in Patriotism.

Patriotism is never noisy or blatant, never paraded, never indeed much talked about—any more than a man talks of his love for his family—but it is service and sacrifice, service quietly rendered, and sacrifice uncomplainingly endured.

Lesson of the Day.

The very best way to honor those whom we praise and on whom we bestow monuments and flowers will be to show a practical appreciation of what they did by taking proper care of the inheritance they created, preserved and handed over to us.

Digging Back Into History of Yucatan

But for Edward H. Thompson, for many years United States consul to Yucatan, much of the vastly interesting story of the early Mayan civilization would probably be lost to modern knowledge. We would not know that this great ancient city was in high development as late as 900 A. D. But for Mr. Thompson, thousands of relics that help establish evidence of that early civilization and give strength to meager knowledge would still be buried in the tangles of Yucatan jungle, with chance or eventual discovery growing more and more remote. Mr. Thompson labored more than a quarter of a century in this important work.

He translated dim tradition of the sacrificial use by the Mayas of the sacred well at Chi-ch'en Itza into supportable fact, when, after years of work and study, he recovered hundreds of gold, flint, jade and hardened copper relics buried under the silt and debris of uncounted centuries at the bottom of the well, guarded through time by the waters of the great basin. Bones of scores of maidens sacrificed as "wives of the Rain God" were brought to the surface and preserved to science. All of this work was done with a bulky hand dredge, supplemented in the later stages by diving operations of most dangerous character.

In the course of this work Mr. Thompson was led by a tradition related by an aged tribesman to excavate one of the many buried temples in search of the "Stone Book." The tablet was found and revealed that the particular temple the tablet adorned was erected or dedicated in 900 A. D. This does not in any way indicate the date of the founding of this City of the Sacred Well. But it at least gives limit to the time when the civilization of the Mayas began to decline.

And this City of the Sacred Well offers a deeper glimpse into the past through the knowledge that it was constructed largely from an older city of that part of Yucatan, built and occupied and for some unknown reason abandoned long before the year 900. What the ruins of that earlier city may reveal when archaeologists finally bring its secrets to the knowledge of man can only be problematical.

The ruins of scores of ancient cities in Yucatan and other Central American states still exist. These evidences were there centuries before the modern history of Yucatan began with the expedition of Francisco Hernandez de Cordova, Spanish adventurer from Cuba, who discovered the east coast in 1517. Ten years later Francisco de Montejo undertook the conquest of the peninsula, but by 1549 he had established Spanish rule over only half of the territory. This adventurer found evidence of high aboriginal civilization, which already had entered decline. Deserted cities were falling into ruins and others like Chi-ch'en Itza and Uxmal were still occupied by remnants of the former population.

Winona Bible Conference Speakers

Outstanding ministers and bible teachers of the world have been engaged for the annual Winona Lake Bible Conference which will open on August 14 and continue for ten days, ending August 23. The Winona Bible Conference, recognized as the greatest in the entire world, this year will offer an array of talent unexcelled in all the 37 years of its existence. Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, the director, has been busy for months arranging for speakers and teachers and announces the program practically completed.

News Review of Current Events the World Over

President Hoover Urges Economy in National Expenditures—Earthquake Practically Destroys City of Managua—Knut Rockne Dead.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

President Hoover returned to Washington after an eleven-day cruise to Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands, with a countenance that approximated the shade of an almost ripe tomato. West Indian sun and wind had burned his face badly, and there was a strong suspicion the skin would peel. There was no question, however, that he was rested, and greatly so, as a result of his leisurely trip.

One of his first announcements was that a tax increase could be avoided if his budget and other recommendations for expenditures were not increased by congress next winter. To that end he appealed to the nation to bring pressure on congress against "the demands of sectional or group interests."

The statement was made in the face of lagging income tax receipts, indicating a treasury deficit of perhaps $300,000,000 at the close of the current fiscal year, June 30. It was regarded as part of the President's effort to mobilize public sentiment against further soldier bonus legislation, farm relief appropriations or similar proposals in the new congress to convene in December.

Senator William E. Borah, Republican insurgent, Idaho, retorted, through the press, that "the record is that congress has appropriated less than the budget bureau has recommended each session for the last few years." He declared his willingness to cut off the $300,000,000 provided for the administration's naval building program.

ABLISSARD in Rocky mountain and plains states took a toll of eleven lives, including five children, two men and a woman in Colorado. Scores were in a serious condition from frostbite and exposure.

Thousands of cattle perished in a wide area including Wyoming, Colorado, South Dakota, Nebraska and the western parts of Kansas, Oklahoma and Texas. In the southern part of the storm area, peach, apricot and other stone-fruit crops were ruined.

The child victims of the storm were pupils at Pleasant Hill school, Town-er, Colo. The morning of the blizzard, Maude Moser, the teacher, ended classes because of the storm. Carl Miller arrived to take the pupils to their homes in the school bus. Miss Moser started to walk to her home. There were twenty-two children in the bus when Miller started, all between the ages of eight and thirteen.

Three miles from Pleasant Hill the bus plowed into a snow drift ten feet deep and stalled. Outside the mass of falling snow was a curtain, obscuring the road, tracks and covering fences. Miller tried to back toward the school but could not get the wheels of the bus free from the drift.

After remaining with the children for many hours, Miller realized he must get aid or all would perish. In the driving storm he started out, thinking he could reach a farmhouse. Struggling on for more than three miles he fell exhausted in a cornfield and perished.

Five of the children were dead when rescuers found them, but the rest were saved.

There were other tragedies in the storm that swept the mountain states and other sections; but this tragedy was one to arouse the utmost pity. Bravely the children met their fate! They sang and boxed and played to keep warm, as they were told by the driver before he left them to seek aid, as urged by the young leader put in charge, until the merciless wind and chill benumbed them into helpless drownings.

KNUTE KENNETH Rockne, football coach of the University of Notre Dame, with a name that became a collegiate byword, plunged to his death with five fellow passengers and two pilots on a Transcontinental and Western Air, Inc., air liner in the mid-Kansas grazing country.

Witnesses said the Rockne craft, flying through clouds and fog, lost a wing in the air and hurtled to the ground like a crippled bird.

Rockne had only recently recovered from an illness which a year ago had threatened to terminate his brilliant coaching career. Last year, however, he developed one of the very best of his many excellent teams, and made a schedule for 1931 which indicated that he looked forward to an equally great team this year.

American football sustains a great loss. Americans lose one who typified the best in useful, wide-awake citizenship.

President Hoover in an official statement described the death of Rockne as "a national loss."

THE development of Fascism in Italy is to be marked further on July 1 of this year by the banishment of the twelve good men and true from the penal courts of Mussolini. Juries are abolished with the reform of the courts of assizes, or those which try criminal cases, which Premier Mussolini will put in effect three months hence, and for them will be substituted a judicial committee, or what's called a "collegio" consisting of two professional judges and five nontechnical citizens who are called "assessors."

But every one cannot be an assessor. Only special categories of citizens who have high moral and intellectual, if not political attainments, will run the risk of having their names in the wheel to be drawn as assessors.

The reform of the courts of assizes and the abolition of the jury is a result of the reformed penal code in Italy, a work on which Minister of Justice Rocca and his collaborators have labored for five years. The reform was brought about by what were considered scandalous decisions often returned by juries made up of men of insufficient intellectual attainments to distinguish between the facts and the emotional bunk of the lawyers.

Discontent with these abuses had accumulated in less than a century for the jury system was only introduced in Italy in 1848.

Chancellor
Bruening

The emergency decree enormously curtails the vital civil rights anchored to the German constitution.

Based on the action on article 48 of the constitution, enabling the President to take dictatorial measures when "security and order are threatened," the decree curtails the personal rights of citizens such as the freedom of speech, the inviolability of homes, freedom of the press, secrecy in the mails, the right to meet when unarmed, the right to form associations, or own property.

Public announcements of political gatherings must be confined to the barest facts. Newspapers infringing upon the terms of the decree may be suspended for eight weeks, and other publications may be suspended for six months.

The public speaking "muzzle decree," the old timers eloquently claim, is more severe than a "kaiser" in the days of the former kaiser.

During adjournment committees will continue working on a mass of internal reform projects, and the reichstag can be called together at any time on the demand of one-third of the members, or the council of elders can authorize such a special call by majority vote.

RUSSIA bade open defiance to the international grain conference at Rome when Abraham Kissin, Soviet delegate, declared that, far from reducing her wheat production, his country would increase it this year and that instead of giving up her policy of so-called "dumping," she intended to increase her wheat exports in order to pay for her imports, which exceed $500,000,000 a year.

"Any proposal to exclude from economic intercourse a nation occupying one-sixth of the world's surface is foredoomed to failure," Kissin said. "Russia's population is increasing at the rate of 4,000,000 a year, which is proportionately twice as great as the increase of Europe's population, therefore we must increase our wheat production."

The United States Agricultural department has estimated that spring wheat plantings would be reduced 14.7 per cent. This exceeded the hope of the farm board for a 10 per cent cut.

Care Of The Birds

MONEY PRIZES ARE OFFERED

Contest To Run For Two Months;
State Man To Be Judge;
Boys Under 16 Eligible

A new adventure of the Fish and Game Club was given support by every member at its meeting last Thursday night, when the committee reported concerning the bird house contest, in which all the boys of 16 years and under might compete for the cash money prizes as follows:

	1st	2nd
Martin House	$1.50	$1.00
Wren House	.75	.25
Robin Shelter	.50	.25
Blue Bird House	.50	.25

Any boy wishing to enter the contest can call on Wilbur Yeiser and get specifications as furnished by the State Department and work at any time. It is the purpose of the club to create a desire on the part of the boys to want to protect the bird life rather than destroy it.

Parents are asked to support the club in this movement and encourage their youngsters in belonging to this local club.

Pest Hunt

The new method of pest hunting is proving to be quite a lively contest, although every member is placed upon his own ability to hunt.

The contest continues until the fall hunt but a checking up is made each month, and the point committee makes an award of $2 to the person having the highest count.

You will look over the table showing the standing of each member and notice the great number of pests that were caught during the past month.

At the conclusion of the business session a luncheon of hot dog sandwiches, coffee, rolls, and dill pickles were served.

The July meeting will be held on the second.

On the back page of this issue will be found a table showing the complete tabulated results of the May contest. Turn to it and study the results.

A recreational program consisting of boating and bathing will be held following the dedicatory services. Visitors are invited to bring their lunches with them for a picnic supper on the camp grounds following the recreational program.

The new building has just been completed at a cost of $17,000 and

A camp meeting period will follow Aug. 18 to 30. The aim will be to fill the park day and night with people who will need and enjoy a vacation on the easiest possible conditions and yet with a good program of a popular and inspiring nature—great addresses and great preaching.

White Jacket Popular Fashion

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

It is the white jacket which tops the dark frock or skirt, a distinctly new trend of thought has been opened to the world of fashion. This movement reflects the influence of the vogue which calls for sharp contrast at the same time that it responds to the insistent demand of the mode for costume detail which is daringly white.

Now that the white-jacket vogue has been set in motion, its popularity is increasing with leaps and bounds. In developing the theme, designers are employing materials of every description. Cottons, linens and such are as much in favor for these smart little immaculately white jackets as are the handsomest of silk crepes, satins and velvets.

One notes in the style parade maybe a white velvet jacket here, a white crepe jacket there, with many a jacket of white all-over eyelet embroidery here, there and everywhere, each one of them posed over a skirt or dress of navy, black or brown as the case may be. The clever jacket to the left in the picture is of rough eyelet embroidered batiste. It is smartly belted with black patent leather. Its shapely peplum and flowing elbow length sleeves are outstanding details. The

Rhubarb Betty Liked as a Dessert

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Here are two old friends who, in a good many homes, have never met each other. Rhubarb, by itself—served as sauce—is sufficiently familiar to need no introduction; in fact, this is almost the only form in which many people know rhubarb. Even when they enjoy rhubarb pie, the rhubarb is sauce before it is pie. "Betty"—bread crumbs and fruit, baked in alternate layers—is most often "apple betty," sometimes peach or prune betty. There is no reason, however, why rhubarb betty should not vary the spring desserts and be popular with the family. It may be made with sweetened rhubarb sauce or raw sliced rhubarb, sprinkled with sugar and alternated with buttered, spiced crumbs. The United States Department of Agriculture has tested the following proportions:

4 lbs. melted butter
4 cups sugar
1 quart fine, dry bread crumbs
1 quart sweetened rhubarb sauce, or 2 quarts raw sliced rhubarb, sugar-sweetened
Cinnamon or nutmeg

Mix the fat and salt with the crumbs. Place the rhubarb and the crumbs in alternate layers in a greased baking dish and sift the cinnamon or nutmeg over the top. Bake the pudding in a moderate oven. If rhubarb sauce is used, this will require about 20 minutes. If raw rhubarb is used, cover the baking dish at first and bake for 25 minutes, or until the rhubarb is tender. Serve the pudding hot with or without hard sauce.

Kill Clothes Moths

Clothes moths can be killed in a handy way by using a noninflammable mixture of three parts of ethylene dichloride and one part carbon tetrachloride. The mixture is put in pans above the clothes or high up in the closet and left for 24 hours to evaporate without opening the door or lid. Use one quart to 200 cubic feet of space.

top the white jacket which is worn with a dark costume. Competing with the jacket which is pure white is the jacket which contrasts the dark color of the dress with bright color. The arresting costume illustrated to the right is designed in black and yellow wool crepe. The close fitting jacket is worn over a blouse of yellow flat crepe that has sleeves half-inch black and yellow. The scarf tied at the neck is also in black and yellow.

One, after another these striking contrasts between jacket and skirt are to be seen wherever fashionables gather. Sometimes it is white, which enlivens black or navy. Then again comes along a jaunty white summer fur coat or bolero worn with gray, for gray with white is very smart. (A 1931, Western Newspaper Union.)

This and That

A man is generous to a fault when he fails to correct it.

Some Homemade Candy Recipes

By NELLIE MAXWELL

There is no moment like the present. The man who will not execute his resolutions when they are fresh upon him can have no hope from them; afterwards they will be dissipated, lost, and perish in the hurry and scurry of the world, or sunk in the slough of indolence.—Maria Edgeworth

A piece of home-made candy is always a welcome addition to any meal.

Date Nut Roll.

Boil one cupful of evaporated milk with two and one-half cupfuls of sugar to the soft ball stage. Add one package of dates sliced and stir well into the mixture, cooking for a few minutes; now add two cupfuls of nuts chopped. Cool, turn out on a buttered platter and knead until creamy and stiff. Shape neatly into a roll, wrap in a damp cloth, place in a covered container and keep cold until sliced.

Maple Fudge.—Boil together one cupful each of granulated sugar and maple sugar, one tablespoonful of corn syrup, a few grains of salt, one-half cupful of water and when the mixture is a thick sirup add one-half cupful of evaporated milk. Stir and cook until it tests for the soft ball. Let stand to cool. When the candy is cool enough to hold the hand on the bottom of the pan, it is ready to stir. At the first sign of stiffening turn into a buttered pan; it will be smooth and shiny when cool enough cut into squares.

Pralines.—Boil together one-half cupful of cream, one and seven-eighths cupfuls of powdered sugar and one cupful of maple sirup. When tried in cold water and a soft ball is formed remove and heat until creamy, adding two cupfuls of pecan meats and drop from a teaspoonful on a buttered paper or pour into small gem pans.

Chocolate Filling.—Melt four squares of chocolate; add to two well beaten yolks of eggs one and one-half cupfuls of sugar, one-half cupful of milk and one tablespoonful of butter. Cook, stirring constantly and boil for one minute, remove from the fire, add the melted chocolate and a teaspoonful of vanilla; beat until thick. Add chopped, seedless raisins and nuts, if desired. This makes an icing which will remain soft and has a beautiful gloss.

with buttered, spiced crumbs. The United States Department of Agriculture has tested the following proportions:

4 lbs. melted butter
4 cups sugar
1 quart fine, dry bread crumbs
1 quart sweetened rhubarb sauce, or 2 quarts raw sliced rhubarb, sugar-sweetened
Cinnamon or nutmeg

Mix the fat and salt with the crumbs. Place the rhubarb and the crumbs in alternate layers in a greased baking dish and sift the cinnamon or nutmeg over the top. Bake the pudding in a moderate oven. If rhubarb sauce is used, this will require about 20 minutes. If raw rhubarb is used, cover the baking dish at first and bake for 25 minutes, or until the rhubarb is tender. Serve the pudding hot with or without hard sauce.

Kill Clothes Moths

Clothes moths can be killed in a handy way by using a noninflammable mixture of three parts of ethylene dichloride and one part carbon tetrachloride. The mixture is put in pans above the clothes or high up in the closet and left for 24 hours to evaporate without opening the door or lid. Use one quart to 200 cubic feet of space.

All of the sea fairies were now back in their boats and how the breaker boats did toss and break! They roared with the fun, and the low, deep voice of Mother Ocean murmured all the time.

"I never fails to make you very angry."

"I suppose that is what you like," said Mr. Wind.

"Of course," said the sea fairies. "Then you blow up into a rage and we have more fun than ever, and the breaker boats go so wonderfully."

"I should say they did," said one poor little sand fairy, who had been knocked over and over all the time by the sea fairies.

But she really didn't mind. It had all been quite jolly. The sea fairies wore their fluffy white dresses and their green shoes and stockings. Such gorgeous green shoes and stockings as they were.

Cretonne, Linen Used to Cover Chairs

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

When we speak of slip covers we generally have in mind the dust covers of cretonne, linen, and other washable materials that are used to make the house look cooler in hot weather, or to protect the furniture.

There is, however, another very useful type of slip cover which is made as a substitute for upholstery. These covers are removable, but they are much more snug-fitting than the dust-cover type. A slip cover of this kind is intended to be a permanent part of the chair, but because it is detachable, it can be removed and cleaned or laundered when necessary. Another advantage of these removable upholstery covers is that if the chair is wanted in a different room a new slip can be made for it at relatively little expense to harmonize with the new surroundings.

Many materials are suitable for slip covers. Cotton fabrics are particularly adaptable to this purpose because they are easy to handle, and launder well. However, if the slip cover is to take the place of upholstery, the heavier cotton fabrics such as rep, denim, and crash are to be preferred. Any materials for a cover of this kind should be preshrunk.

The illustrations show how the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture has used slip covers over the worn and faded upholstery of some padded chairs in a room with bright-colored figured window draperies. A plain blue green cotton rep which repeated one of the colors in the hangings was chosen for the slip covers. Ready-made black sixteen cording in the seams gave character to the covers and repeated the color of the painted chair frames. Before making the slip covers, the bureau specialists improved the chairs, originally a drab green shade, by painting them with two coats of black enamel. When finished, therefore, the chairs were in harmony with the other furnishings of the room.

"In making a slip cover of this kind," says the bureau, "fit the material right on the chair, wrong side up, unless there is a pronounced figure which must be centered. Mark lines for seams with pencil or tailor's chalk. Cut out the fabric with liberal allowances. Sew the cording first to the straight edge of the side strips or 'boxing,' as these strips are called; then carefully baste this strip to the front and back sections, keeping the filling or crosswise threads of the material always parallel to the floor. In most materials, the rounded corners can be slightly eased onto the straight strip.

"Cut the front section of the back cover long enough to pass under the lower edge of the frame and snap to the lower edge of the back section."

Scarf Now Entrenched for Evening Occasions

Whether or not scarfs would become as firmly entrenched in evening affairs as in daytime ones is something we were not certain of until we saw some of the latest evening gowns. There they were, each frock had its own scarf that could be wound about the throat or worn trailing out in back. A most intriguing idea.

SEWING MACHINE EMBROIDERY IS EFFECTIVE AND SAVES TIME

HAVE you learned to embroider the sewing machine way? No? Well, it's easy—easy to learn, easy to do—and the work goes so quickly you can initial a dozen napkins, monogram a table cloth, smock a frock, or embroider fancy designs, or monograms on guests towels in no time at all. The new art is called trim stitch, and requires no other equipment than a suitable trim stitch cotton, a very coarse machine needle, the machine itself, and electric or foot power.

The thread used is firmly twisted and heavy in comparison with the thread in general use. You can get it in bright colors, such as you would expect to find in embroidery silks and cottons. You will require a machine needle capable of carrying a 20 to 30 six-cord thread. Secure bolofast colors, so that they will go through the laundry without injury. For outlining, monogramming, initialing, or stitching, use the trim stitch thread on top and in the bobbin. For the most effective work, the stitches should run from eight to ten to the inch. Two contrasting colors, such as blue or green on top and yellow or orange in the bobbin are effective. Smocking is beautiful for dress yokes, for sleeves, for holding skirt fullness, for smocks, and for fine dresses of sheer fabric. For this work, adjust the stitch to seven or eight to the inch, and have an ordinary tension. Use also 24 white, six-cord thread in the bobbin. As these bobbin threads are the ones you will have to pull when it comes to the stitching, they will need to be strong. Group your trim stitch colors as you would for hand smocking, and stitch the rows true, so that when shirred up they will be perfectly even. When all the rows are in, stitch across one end to hold them securely. Then, from the opposite end shir the stitching up, pulling the bobbin threads only, drawing them up at the same time.

For tablecloths and napkins, this machine embroidery way is an easy method of initialing or monogramming. In initialing bath towels use large initials and stitch twice around each line. For table linen, use white trim stitch, and stitch the initial solid; that is, with from two to six rows of stitching close together. Whenever a tailored stitching line is desirable, as on the edges of the collars shown in the sketch, several even rows of one color or of contrasting colors are effective.

THE PRESIDENT AT

Indianapolis, June 10.—Completion of arrangements for the reception of President Herbert Hoover and his wife when they visit Indiana next Monday for an overnight stay was announced today by officials of the Indiana Republican Editorial Association, at whose invitation the chief executive is coming to speak at the annual dinner of the editors.

At the same time it was announced that reservations have been received for virtually all of the 5,000 seats available in the Manufacturers' building at the Indiana state fairground, where the dinner will be served and where the President will make his principal address of the summer. With only few seats at the dinner tables unsold, the Editorial Association turned attention to the accommodation of an overflow crowd. Additional chairs will be placed around the borders of the banquet hall to admit the general public. Electric amplifiers will be installed both within the building and outside in the hope that everybody coming to the building will have an opportunity to listen to the address.

Three-hundred and fifty of Butler university's fairest coeds have been chosen for waiters at the banquet and considerable competition is developing as the time nears for selection of the group to wait at the table occupied by the President and the First Lady of the Land. As honored guests of the state of Indiana, President Hoover and his wife will have an opportunity of tasting real Hoosier fried chicken and all the other delicacies produced in this state.

The Presidential train is scheduled to arrive at the Union Station in Indianapolis shortly after four o'clock the afternoon of June 15 after a fast trip from Cincinnati, O. Residents of cities and villages along the route are expected to congregate at their railway stations and wave greetings to the distinguished visitors.

At the Union Station in Indianapolis the Presidential party will be welcomed by a reception committee chosen from among the members of the Editorial Association and their wives. A military escort consisting of Regular army and National Guard troops, United States Marines, Reserve Army Officers, the Naval Militia and other groups will lead the march through the downtown district, past the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument and the new Indiana World War Memorial Plaza to the home of the Governor. After a short rest the President will be taken to the fairground for the dinner. He is expected to deliver his address shortly after 8 P. M. President and Mrs. Hoover will spend the night as the guests of Governor and Mrs. Leslie and early the following morning will entrain for Marion, O., where they are to attend the dedication of the new Harding memorial.

According to advices from Washington, the President and Mrs. Hoover will be accompanied by the usual White House attaches and secret service agents. In addition, approximately thirty Washington newspaper correspondents will make the trip with the chief executive. The customary military guard will patrol the premises about the Governor's home while the President is there, it is understood.

Because of the short time available for the trip, the President was obliged to decline almost countless invitations to attend various functions, make addresses, meet local celebrities and receive honorary degrees. Viewing the Indiana address as one of the most important he will make this year, the President is understood to have given especial attention to the document and, consequently, did not wish to burden himself with too many outside functions.

Immediately after his address at the Marion, O., dedication, he will entrain for Springfield, Ill., where he will speak at the dedication of the Abraham Lincoln memorial. And then, a hurried trip back to the White House the same evening. Thus, in less than four days the President will travel through more than a half-dozen states, speaking in three, and be back at his desk in the White House transacting government business. His hurried mid-western tour will carry him the full distance across Indiana twice, besides the trip from Ohio to Indianapolis and return.

A glance at the reservation list discloses that every county in Indiana will be represented at the banquet, with several delegations planning to make the trip by special trains or chartered motor buses. The program leading up to the address of the President will be brief. Paul R. Bausman, president of the Indiana Republican Editorial Association, will preside and introduce the Rev. Charles Woodman, pastor of the West

Our records for the 1930-31 testing year show that we milked an average of 9.8 cows for the year. They produced 65,822 pounds of milk, 3361.8 pounds of butter fat which had a total value of $1,570.14. Feed cost amounted to $666.75 leaving a profit over feed cost of $903.39—$92.00 per cow. This record included two Sr. yearlings and two two-year olds which materially reduced the average of the mature cows.

The redingote dress made of plain and print silk has already become so popular and familiar a fashion, it no longer remains a novelty. However, these charming frocks, which are the ideal of the moment in the world of fashion, present only one phase of the question. There are other paths to explore, one of which leads into the realm of the tailored wool ensemble styled with a redingote.

The picture herewith presents a smart version of the redingote ensemble, tailored of handsome cloth, as has been shown this season. Both the redingote coat and the one-piece dress which it tops are made of two-tone gray tweed. Its only embellishment is rows and rows of stitching. To give it the proper dash of gay color, milady wears a bright green crepe scarf, tied under the coat, for the new ascot scarfs are supposed to be worn just like that.

In some instances the redingote street costume is varied in that cloth and silk are combined. That is, a one-piece dress of print silk—plaids and stripes being newer than florals—is topped with a cloth coat designed along redingote lines so that the front opening reveals the gay frock underneath.

An ensemble of this type is very practical, as the long redingote can be made to serve as a separate top-coat throughout spring and summer, while the dress, if short-sleeved, tunes to the mild days to come. A navy flannel coat with navy and white print for the frock is particularly smart both as to materials and as to color combination.

Perhaps even more practical is the new three-in-one redingote ensemble which features, in place of the long one-piece coat, a bolero and a skirt (open at the front) of the cloth, these designed to be worn over the printed frock for street and about town. Minus the jacket and detachable cloth top skirt, the silk frock tunes to dressy afternoon wear.

SUMMER CULLING

(By Prof. A. G. Phillips)

In the year 1931, it is very practical that all poultry keepers practice rapid culling of their laying flock, beginning in June. When egg prices are low and poultry meat a reasonable price, it is profitable to sell every laying hen as soon as she ceases laying. A non-layer in June is a loss, regardless of the price of eggs or the cost of feed. She has been a poor layer and will never be any different in months to come.

Poultry meat prices are higher in 1931, in proportion to feed and egg prices than they were in 1930. These will become lower in the fall months approach. It is, therefore, economical to sell unsatisfactory birds now so that money may be available to buy egg mash for the better birds to keep up summer production, or to buy mash for growing pullets. In many flocks it will be practical to eliminate about 25% of the birds in June, this figure increasing to about 50% by September or late August.

Many farmers are faced with the problem of financing the growing of pullets. With a short chick crop in 1931, there is every indication that the pullet crop will be short this fall and that those who have pullets ready to lay in October, will be able to profit handsomely from the eggs which are produced. When the pullet crop is short, prices of fresh eggs should be higher. All of this means that it will pay to push pullets with good feeding and management so they are ready to lay in late September or early October. In order to do this, growing pullets must not be denied mash or stunted in the quantity which they are fed.

It is economical to keep mash and grain in hoppers in front of the pullets through the entire summer so they may have opportunity to consume all they desire. It may even pay to feed a wet mash in the late summer months when consumption may diminish due to the hot weather.

The sale of poor or non-laying hens, now will provide money with which to finance the expense of growing pullets. Every State Experiment Station has available printed bulletins or circulars describing the correct way to cull or eliminate the undesirable birds.

Egg production, good or bad, can be determined by examining the physical condition of the birds and a little experience in following the directions given in the State Experiment Station bulletins will enable any poultry keeper to cull his birds with reasonable accuracy.

As a special tribute to the distinguished visitors, the various troops of Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts of Indianapolis will form a solid file on each side of Meridian street the entire distance from the Union Station to the Governor's home. The President is national honorary president of the Boy Scouts of America and Mrs. Hoover heads the Girl Scouts. As honorary head of the Girl Scouts, Mrs. Hoover visited Indianapolis last October on the occasion of the annual convention of the National Council.

JOCKEY IS WEALTHY

Although George H. Bostwick is a millionaire in his own right, the young society man nevertheless risks his neck daily during the racing season by riding as a jockey in the steeplechase events. He is considered not only the best amateur or gentleman rider, but the best of any class including the professional brush-toppers, too. Last year Bostwick was one of the leading candidates for the United States International polo team, losing his place with the hard-riding four by only a narrow margin.

Lesson for June 14

THE RESURRECTION AND THE ASCENSION

GOLDEN TEXT—Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who maketh intercession for us.

LESSON TEXT—Luke 24:25-51.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Living Now.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Living Now.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Our Living Lord.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Meaning of the Resurrection.

The resurrection of Christ is one of the foundation truths of Christianity. It is the grand proof that Christ was what he claimed to be—the Messiah, the Son of God (Matt. 12:33, 40; John 2:19-21).

1. The Empty Tomb (vv. 1-12). Luke does not enter into a description of the manner of the resurrection of Christ or offer any proof of the fact other than that the tomb was empty. He does, however, indicate the process by which the disciples had become convinced of its reality.

1. The testimony of the men in shining apparel (vv. 4-6). The women who had come to the sepulcher bringing spices found the stone rolled away and the sepulcher empty. While they were in a state of perplexity these men in shining garments informed them that Jesus had arisen.

2. The report of the women to the disciples (vv. 7-11). The women believed the announcement made to them because they found that it was in agreement with what Jesus had prophesied. They immediately reported the fact of the empty tomb to the disciples.

3. Peter investigating (v. 12). Peter was so impressed with the news brought by the women concerning the empty tomb that he ran to see whether the report was true. He was convinced that the tomb was empty, but was perplexed over the matter. If he had believed the words of the Lord his personal investigation would have cleared the matter in his mind.

11. Two Discouraged Disciples (vv. 13-35).

1. The walk to Emmaus (vv. 13-15). Emmaus was seven and a half miles northwest of Jerusalem. The topic of conversation was the tragedy of the cross and the resurrection rumors. So little had the Lord's teaching about his resurrection impressed the disciples that the reports which the women brought were to them as idle tales.

2. An unrecognized companion (v. 16-24).
 a. Who he was (v. 15). While they reasoned together on the wonderful events of the last few days, Jesus joined them. Even when he questioned them concerning their sadness they did not recognize him.

b. His question (v. 17). Perceiving their sadness and perplexity he sought to help them by calling forth an expression of their grief.</

The Plains of Abraham

By James Oliver Curwood

© by Doubleday Doran Co., Inc.
WNU Service.

It was the testimony of the late James Oliver Curwood that there was more fact than fiction in this novel; that the heroine, Marie Antoinette Tonteur, and her fierce old father lived and loved as described in the story; that Catherine Bulain and her valiant son were flesh and blood of their day; that "The Plains of Abraham," like several other of the more important characters were not creatures of fancy; that "The Plains of Abraham," like to which it is closely related, is largely a romance of life as it was lived, and not as it might have been lived.

The author also asserted that the gathering of the material had been the most thrilling adventure of his life; the traveling foot by foot over the hallowed ground, the reading of letters written by hands dead a hundred and fifty years or more, the dreaming over yellow manuscripts written by priests and martyrs and, lastly, the unweaving of loves and hates and tragedies and happiness of the almost forgotten period embracing the very birth of both the American and Canadian peoples, and weighted with happenings that shook the foremost nations of the earth and largely made them what they are today.

The story passes through phases of life in the Champlain and Richelieu regions and reaches its finale on the Plains of Abraham at Quebec, in that historic struggle which curbed the ambitions of the French, established the ascendancy of the English and drew the first crude boundaries of the future United States and Canada.

CHAPTER I

On a sunny afternoon in May, 1740, a dog, a boy, a man, and a woman had crossed the oak opens of Tonteur's hill and were trailing toward the deeper wilderness of the Richelieu and Lake Champlain—the dog first, the boy following, the man next, and the woman last.

It was a reversal of proper form. Tonteur had growled as he watched them go. A fool's way of facing a savage-infested country that had no end. The man should have marched at the head of his precious column with his long gun ready and his questing eyes alert; the woman next, to watch and guard with him; then the boy and the dog, if such nuisances were to be tolerated in travel of this kind, with evening coming on.

Tonteur was the one-legged warrior seigneur from whose gristmill down in the valley the four were going home.

His eyes had followed the woman with a subdued and appraising hunger in them. Henri Bulain was a strange man, he had thought. He might be a little crazy, might even be a fool. But he was also a very lucky husband to possess a woman with the sweet face and form and the divinely chaste heart of Catherine, his wife.

Jeems was a fortunate boy to have her for a mother.

Even the dog was a scoundrel for luck. An Indian dog at that. A sneaking, good-for-nothing dog. A wreck of a dog without a soul, to be fed by her, petted by her, smiled at by her—as he had seen her smile.

Tonteur was first of the long string of heroic fighting barons settled by France along the Richelieu to hold the English and their red barbarians back. He was doorkeeper to the waterway that led straight to the heart of New France. If the English came with their scalping hounds, the Mohawks and the Senecas, they would have to pass over him first of all. No general could be given greater distinction than that. Honor. Wealth. A wide domain over which he was king.

He envied Henri Bulain.

It was mid-afternoon. Maytime shadows were growing longer toward the east. It was the hour when birds were singing softly. Morning had heard their defiance, a glorious and fearless challenge of feathered minstrelsy to all the spirits of darkness; but with late afternoon, sunset, evening, these same slim-throated songsters found a note of gratitude and of prayer in their chastened voices. Flowers crushed underfoot. In the open spaces they carpeted the earth with white and pink and blue. Flowers and birds and peace—a world filled with a declining sun—a smiling heaven of blue over the treetops—and with them a dog, a boy, a man, and a woman advancing westward.

Three of these, even the dog, Tonteur envied.

This dog had a name which fitted him, Tonteur had thought. For he was a wreck of a dog—even more a wreck than the splendid seigneur himself, with his stub of a shot-off leg and a breast that bore sword marks which would have killed an ordinary man. The dog, first of all, was a homely dog, so hopelessly homely that one could not help loving him at sight. His hair was briefly and unkempt. His paws huge. His tail was half gone, which left him only a stub of one. He walked with a limp, a heavy, never-failing limp that seemed to shake his long body from end to end, for his left fore paw—like Tonteur's foot—was missing. A crooked, cheery, inartistic, lovable dog to whom the woman—in a moment's visioning of the stress of things—had given the name of Odds-and-Ends.

So Tonteur was half right in thinking of him as a wreck of a dog, but in one other thing he was wrong. The dog did have a soul—a soul that belonged to the boy, his master. That soul had a great scar seared upon it by hunger and abuse in an Indian camp where Henri Bulain had found him four years before, and from which, out of pity for a dying, creature, he had taken him home to Jeems. It was a scar cut deep by clubs and kicks, a wound that had never healed, and that made the dog what he was—a tireless and suspicious hunter of scents and sounds in the woods.

Of the four who were filing westward, he seemed to be the only one who watched and listened for danger to come out of the beauty and stillness of the world about them. Now and then he glanced up at his master. Trouble lay in the boy's face and eyes. The dog sensed it after a little and whined in a questioning way in his throat.

Daniel James Bulain was the boy's name, but from babyhood his mother had called him Jeems. He was twelve and weighed twenty pounds more than his dog. Odds-and-Ends, called Odd for short, weighed sixty. If the scales in Tonteur's gristmill were right. One would have known the dog and the boy belonged together even had they been in a crowd, for if Odd was a battered old warrior, the boy, on the other hand, gave every evidence of an ambition to achieve a similar physical condition.

"Why, he's dressed up like a bold, bad pirate come to abduct my little girl and hold her for ransom," Tonteur had roared, down in the valley, and Jeems' father had joined the baron in his laughter; then, to make the thing worse, Tonteur had turned him found and round, slowly and appraisingly, with lovely little Marie Antoinette looking on, her dainty nose upturned in patrician disdain—and with Paul Tache, her detestable cousin from the great city of Quebec, openly leering and grinning at him from behind her back. And this after he had prepared himself with painstaking care for Marie Antoinette's eyes should she happen to see him! That was the tragedy of it. He had put on his new doek suit. He carried a gun which was two inches longer than himself. A big powderhorn swung at his waist, in his belt was a knife, and over his shoulder hung the most treasured of his possessions, a slim ash bow and a quiver filled with arrows. He had worn his cockskin cap of fur in spite of the warmth of the day, because it looked better than the lighter cap which was striped, and in this, the dog, was proud of his martial-looking master, but he could not understand the change that had come over the boy or why he was going home with such a strangely set and solemn face.

From her position behind the dog, the boy, and the man, Catherine Bulain looked upon her world with a joyous and unafraid pride. No boy, in her opinion, could equal Jeems, and no man her husband. One could see and feel her happiness, and as Tonteur secretly built up the fire of his yearning when he was alone, so she loved to exult in her own possessions when her man folk were ahead and could not see all that came and went in her face. This desire to hold within herself some small and sacred part of her rejoicing was because she was English and not French. That was why Daniel James had an English name, inherited from her father, who had been a New England schoolmaster and afterward an agent of the Penns down in Pennsylvania. It was on the frontier of that far province that Henri had found and married her.

Tonteur was aware, possibly even more than Henri Bulain, that Catherine's adoption of her men folk and of everything that went with them, even to the primitive discomforts of the wilderness life which had claimed her, was built up against a background of something more than merely being the mate of a man and the mother of a child. Culture and learning and broadness of vision and thought, nurtured in her first by a gentle mother, and, after her death, developed and strengthened by a schoolmaster father, had given to her a medium of priceless value by which to measure happiness and unhappiness.

Because of her adroitness in fashioning beauty and perfection out of simple and inexpensive things, and also because she was of the spawn of the despicable English, Madame Henriette Tonteur had come to regard her with much the same aversion and dislike with which she would have looked upon a cup of poison.

Tonteur knew this and cursed in his honest heart at the woman who was his wife, with her coldly patrician face, her powdered hair, her jewels and gowns and her platonic ignorance of love—and then thanked his God that little Marie Antoinette was growing less like her with each day that passed over her pretty head. For passed over her pretty head, when Marie Antoinette was temperamental, like himself, a patrician without doubt, but with a warm and ready passion to offset that curse, and for this, too, he blessed the fortune which in one way had been so kind to him.

Behind her husband and boy Catherine had been thinking of Tonteur and of his wife, the aristocratic Henriette. For a long time she had known of Madame Tonteur's hatred, but it was not until this afternoon that the other discovery had come to her, for, in spite of his most heroic efforts, Tonteur had betrayed himself when suddenly she had caught him looking at her. Catherine had seen the shadow of his secret—like a ghost swiftly disappearing. Up over the hill she had added many twos and twos together, until in the sure way of a woman, she knew what Tonteur was thinking and did not fear or distrust him for it.

And Madame Tonteur's hatred had been said of Catherine, she hated her first as a deadly enemy of her race, and hated her then because she dared hold her head as proudly as a baron's lady, and hated her last of all because, nothing more than the wife of a worthless backwoodsman like Henri Bulain, she was impudent enough to be the prettiest woman anywhere near the Tonteur seigneurie.

And, so far as it was in her power, she had planted and nurtured this hatred to growth in the heart and mind of her proud daughter, Marie Antoinette, until Tonteur, blind to the subtle subtlety of a woman in such matters, wondered why it was that his girl, whom he worshiped above all other things on earth, should so openly display unfriendliness and dislike whenever Jeems came to Tonteur manor.

Of this same thing Jeems had been thinking as he walked ahead of his father and mother. His mind, at present, was busy with the stress of fighting. Mentally and physically in a way, he was experiencing the thrill of sanguinary battle. Half a dozen times since beginning the long climb over Tonteur's hill he had choked and choked and choked, and in every moment of these mental triumphs Marie Antoinette looked on with wonder and horror as he pitilessly snarled and vanquished her handsome young cousin from the big city of Quebec.

Even in the heat of these vivid imaginings, Jeems was sick at heart, and it was the shadow of this sickness which Odd caught when he looked up into his master's eyes. From the day Jeems had first seen Marie Antoinette, when she was seven and he was nine, he had dreamed of her, and had anticipated through weeks and months the journeys which his father permitted him to make with him to Tonteur manor. On these rare occasions at the little princess of the seigneurie and had made her presents of flowers and feathers and nuts and maple sugar and queer treasures which he brought from the forests. These tokens of his homage had never served to build a bridge across the abyss which lay between them.

Maya Indians Have Been "Pioneers" in Corn?

At Quirigua, in the republic of Guatemala, there exists a number of most interesting ruins, apparently the remains of temples and other public buildings. There are many individual monoliths, erected as monuments of different sorts, sculptured with human faces and figures and animal designs, as well as hieroglyphics, which archeologists have not as yet been able to decipher accurately. One such stone bears a date in Mayan chronology which has been computed to coincide with 568 A. D. of the Gregorian calendar. The carving of this monolith, which is the largest of the surviving remnants, is still clear and perfect, despite the long procession of centuries that has passed over it. Inscriptions and representations on this and other stones tend to the belief that Indian corn was first cultivated in Guatemala. The cornucopia of the Mayan Indians were probably the first attempts to cook corn, or maize, and these cakes are still today the staple of the Guatemalan and Mexican diet.

Seedless Oranges

The original seedless oranges were produced in Brazil by means of budding and the orange trees of this type in the United States all descended from two imported trees. Buds or budding sticks are taken from seedless orange trees in spring or fall and inserted in two-year-old seedling orange trees of ordinary type. When the buds send out shoots the seedlings are cut back so that only the budding portions develop.

"Little Stories for Bedtime"

by Thornton W. Burgess

SAVING GREEN FOREST

THE smoke from the Red Terror swept down from the Old Pasture across the Green Meadows. The eyes of the little meadow and forest people huddled together in fear on the bank of the Smiling Pool smarted. Their throats smarted, and as the smoke grew thicker they choked and coughed. Only those who live in the Smiling Pool and the Laughing Brook, Billy Mink, Jerry Muskrat, Little Joe Otter, Grandfather Frog, and Spotty the Turtle, did not fear for themselves. Billy and Jerry and Little Joe knew that if the Red Terror did sweep down to the Smiling Pool all they had to do to be safe was to dive and swim to certain secret holes in the bank with the entrances under water, and in those holes they would be safe. Grandfather Frog and Spotty the Turtle would bury themselves in the mud at the bottom of the Smiling Pool and there they would be safe.

So these five did not fear for themselves, but they did fear for some of their friends. They didn't believe the Red Terror would be able to jump across the Smiling Pool and the Laughing Brook, but if it should—well, if it should some might lose their lives and all of them would be homeless. So a great fear, a terrible fear lay over all the little people of the Green Meadows and the Green Forest.

Steadily the Red Terror ate its way through the Old Pasture toward the Green Forest. Gasping for breath, blackened with smoke, Farmer Brown, the Farmer Brown's Boy, and some of their neighbors fought the Red Terror and tried to beat it back. In spite of all they could do the Red Terror ate its way on and on. In a very few minutes now it would reach the edge of the Green Forest, and once there there would be no stopping it. Farmer Brown felt a little puff of air on one cheek.

"I believe the wind is going to rise and it is from the right direction," he panted and worked harder than ever. He didn't know it, but it was one of the Merry Little Breezes trying to help. He felt another and another and a little hope sprang up in his heart. Then suddenly there was a stronger puff and then a steady wind began to blow stronger and stronger. Old Mother West Wind had arrived. Harder she blew and harder, and the Merry Little Breezes joined her and blew, too. Little Joe Otter drove the Red Terror back. The Laughing Brook, Billy Mink, Jerry Muskrat, Little Joe Otter, Grandfather Frog, and Spotty the Turtle, did not fear for themselves. Billy and Jerry and Little Joe knew that if the Red Terror did sweep down to the Smiling Pool all they had to do to be safe was to dive and swim to certain secret holes in the bank with

"I don't know where that wind came from so suddenly," said Farmer Brown as he mopped his brow with a handkerchief, "but it came just in time. It is all that saved the Green Forest. Now, son, you stay here and keep watch. The rest of us can go home, I guess."

"I won't have to keep watch long," replied Farmer Brown's Boy, pointing to the sky. The others looked and there was a black rain cloud being hurried along by some of the Merry Little Breezes. Pretty soon raindrops began to hiss on the hot ground where the Red Terror had been. Then the rain poured down, and when it was over the Red Terror was gone. Only the blackened sticks and the whitened ashes of the Old Pasture showed that it ever had been.

Old Mother West Wind gathered her children into the big bag and swung it over her shoulder and started for the Purple Hills, although it was not yet night.

"I've blown myself out," said she, "and I can do no more work today."

"You've done enough," muttered Peter Rabbit under his breath, for he had overheard her. "Yes, indeed, you've done enough for one day, and I shall love you always."

And this is how Old Mother West Wind and her Merry Little Breezes saved the Green Forest.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

POINTING

POINTING at a daffodil will stop its blooming. Pointing at a cucumber will cause it to wither so that it falls off the vine. These are two "pointing" superstitions which are frequently met with in the rural sections of the land. Doubtless the reader will recall others of a kindred sort.

The superstition rests upon the power and significance which the ancients believed to reside in manual gestures. Reversing a paragraph of Ellworthy it may be said that if the hand in past ages has been looked upon as a powerful protector against that special form of evil which is supposed to be flashed from one person to another, whether through the eye or the touch of malice, it has also been regarded as an instrument of evil when used by the malignant. In general the hand signified power.

In an Egyptian tomb at Tel-el-Amarna the pharaoh and his family are represented as worshipping the sun whose rays are stretched out toward them, each ray ending in a hand. Innumerable instances might be added to illustrate the importance with which the ancients regarded the hand and manual gestures. The gesture of pointing with the forefinger was emphatically the accusatory gesture. From the extended finger a negative current, as it were, passed with malignant power to the person or thing pointed at. Therefore when you point at a daffodil or a cucumber you work it mischief.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

THE WORD "LANGUAGE"

IN THIS world we moderns are the heirs of all the ages. Every era, every epoch, every generation has contributed to the language we speak today.

And behind almost every word there is a reason, some motivating cause that is responsible for its introduction into our lexicon.

Take, for instance, the word "language" itself. Why do we call it "language"? To the initiated, the very question answers itself.

"Language" in the sense in which we use it is the crystallization of ideas through the medium of words, created by the vocal organs. And the chief vocal organ is the tongue—so much so that the very word "tongue" is synonymous, to a great extent, with the word "language."

This connection is more than a coincidence. For the word "language" is derived from the Latin word for "tongue" which is "lingua."

The Old Gardener Says:

EVERGREENS are fairly expensive; for that reason those to be used in the home garden should be chosen with care. Arborvitae and junipers are common but are far inferior to the Japanese yew, Taxus cuspidata, an imported evergreen, which is remarkably well adapted to American gardens. It comes in several forms, tall and dwarf, and has beautiful glossy green leaves, which maintain their good color the year around. Amateurs who are planning to set out an evergreen shrub may well investigate the good points of this Japanese immigrant, which can be used with equal success in foundation planting or on the lawn.

Debt Due French Chemists

Peruvian Indians used cinchona bark as a remedy for malaria, but the advanced step of separating the active constituent quinine from the bark was taken in 1820 by two French chemists.

H. B. Warner

Popular H. B. Warner of the cinema world is the son of Charles Warner, famous English actor, and in his father's London company obtained his first stage experience. Probably his best known stage play in America was "Aimee Jimmy Valentine." He appeared in numerous productions before talking pictures. He will be well remembered in "The Green Goddess" and numerous others.

For Meditation

CIVIC RESPONSIBILITY

ANNUAL elections in many cities and small towns usually occur in the spring time. Those who have the right to vote, cast their ballot for their municipal officers, but, the pity of it is that all who have that privilege do not exercise it. Of the total number of available votes only a small portion is cast. This has been variously estimated and figured as low as one-third. The fact is that the number of votes not cast usually represents an element, which if it would cast its vote, would register in favor of high moral idealism in public life. The latter element is in the majority in practically every American city, and the only reason we have corruption in public administration is because the people are willing to put up with it.

This moral element, while it is in the majority, may seem to slumber, but its conscience is not adamant. Once aroused, its force gains in momentum until, with one mighty blow, it sweeps everything before it, and cleans up the political life in its community.

A minority is always a powerful factor in any important cause, because it usually has on its side a fair share of wealth and strength. Moral values, however, do not depend upon material strength. The cause of righteousness is always a more powerful factor because life, liberty and happiness is dependent upon it. Remove moral idealism from public life and you have history repeating itself, as in the fall of the Roman empire. Enthrone moral idealism in the social order, and you have security of home, education, and citizenship.

The responsibility of the vote is very great. It should never be thought of. Its exercise should be considered a duty, which every citizen owes to himself, his family and his country.

YOUR FOOD AND YOUR TEETH

(By Betty Barclay)

Comparatively few people realize that the foods they eat and drink, or perhaps fail to eat and drink, have much to do with the condition of their teeth.

A couple of generations ago the tooth brush was practically unknown. Dentrificers were few and far between. Yet most of us can remember a grandparent or a great uncle who had a wonderful set of teeth at an advanced age. Those of us who remember this often wonder why it is that our children have to visit a dentist at such an early age.

Probably one reason for early tooth decay is the fact that we do not call upon our teeth to do the work that grandfather's teeth were obliged to do. Grandfather ate heavy, coarse foods that required a great deal of chewing. Exercise has the same effect upon the teeth and gums as it has upon any other portion of the body. Without realizing it grandfather was keeping his teeth in good condition by plain old-fashioned chewing of food.

Recent scientific research, however, has taught us that tooth decay is closely tied up with a lack of vitamin C in our food. Dr. Milton T. Hanke, of the University of Chicago, conducted experiments which showed the average American diet to be largely deficient in this vitamin. Even the diet of the wealthy usually does not contain enough of this element for proper nutrition. The reason for this, according to Dr. Hanke is that this particular vitamin, though found in a number of fresh fruits and vegetables, is very unstable and easily destroyed by cooking. It appears that the body can not store this vitamin for any length of time and needs a new supply every day.

By drinking one pint of orange juice, daily with the juice of a lemon added, it is possible to bring about a marked improvement in unhealthy gum tissue, and to arrest and hinder tooth decay. Improvement is also shown in the general health and bodily condition of those who take this treatment. Both orange and lemon juice, by the way, contain liberal quantities of vitamin C.

Going back once more to grandfather's day, one can easily see a reason, other than tooth exercise, for grandfather's good teeth. He nibbled apples, plums, pears and peaches as he walked through his orchard. He ate liberal quantities of green vegetables from his garden. Without knowing a thing about vitamins his food probably contained more vitamin C than the food of most of us today.

The popular habit of drinking a glass of orange juice for breakfast will be a very valuable factor in the preservation of the nation's teeth. This habit should be one enjoyed by children as well as by adults. In addition, if a liberal portion of salad is served once a day, and also a fruit cup containing oranges and lemons, it is more than probable that the necessary amount of vitamin C will be secured.

Those who persist in depending upon foods which do not contain vitamin C in liberal quantities may just as well set aside a column in their budget for dental work, and feel quite confident that they will spend more for this than their brothers and sisters who strengthen their teeth with this surprisingly beneficial little vitamin.

Important Data For Our Farmer Readers

START YOUR POTATO CULTIVATING EARLY

Level And Shallow Working Should Be Started As Soon As Planting Is Done

The secret of a clean potato patch depends upon thorough cultivation, beginning immediately following planting and continuing at frequent intervals through the growing season. Successful growers usually follow the plan or immediately with a wooden or spike tooth harrow with the teeth slanted backward, leveling off the ridges and thoroughly working the surface soil. This practice is repeated at least once a week until the potato row can be plainly seen across the field, then the first working with an ordinary corn cultivator is given.

At this time make an effort to cultivate close and deep as the potato roots have not reached out and this is the last opportunity to go down deep and loosen the soil close to the seed piece, thus helping the young roots to force their way out where more moisture is available. After this cultivation: shallow, level workings between the rows are best.

Too frequently, potato growers of DeKalb county either ridge the rows early or use a single shovel or deep cultivators and by going down four to six inches destroy thousands of the potato plants' feeding roots and thus lessen dry periods. It seems a much better practice to cultivate level and shallow and have more potatoes rather than to ridge because it makes easier digging.

SPRAY FOR BUGS AND TIP BURN

Three Nozzles To Row and 150 Pounds Pressure Necessary For Work

Spraying in DeKalb county is followed by most farmers in order to get rid of potato bugs but spraying to control diseases and keep the vines vigorous is not commonly done. The practice of thoroughly spraying has given increases in other parts of the state, of as much as 30 bushels per acre. Whether or not growers can afford to spray in DeKalb county will depend upon conditions in your potato field. If your vines die before frost on the late crop or the early ones die prematurely with tip burn, then you can keep them green and growing about two weeks longer, by thorough spraying with Bordeaux mixture.

However, unless you are equipped with a sprayer, that will deliver 150 pounds pressure under three nozzles to a row, then you had better not spray with Bordeaux mixture for tests have shown that only thorough spraying with high power will give increased yields.

Bordeaux mixture can be mixed with lead arsenate and the bugs controlled at the same time. The first spray is usually applied when the vines are about four to six inches high and repeated every ten days to two weeks until four applications are made.

Just how to make Bordeaux mixture, proper equipment, and how to arrange it is all given in Purdue Extension Bulletin No. 89, which may be obtained at the county agent's office free of charge.

Gas groundhogs with calcium cyanide before the end of June; doing it at this time will kill the groundhogs and save rabbits that might be in the den at other seasons.

Many poultry raisers prefer to feed milk to chicks while it is still sweet rather than to wait for it to sour. Changing from sweet to sour milk will result in no harmful effects.

Bordeaux mixture is the best general spray for vegetables and flowers. To make it, dissolve two tablespoons of blue vitriol in three quarts of water; dissolve five tablespoons of lime in a quart of water, add it to the blue vitriol solution, and stir thoroughly.

A hen which goes broody three times deserves a trip to market; she is often a poor layer and certainly not a desirable breeder.

A study of Indiana fence rows usually will show some beautiful plant materials which could be planted on the home grounds.

Early season culling can start any time during May. Look over Purdue Extension Bulletin 175 "How to Tell the Layers" before you begin.

RUSHING PAVING PROJECT

Complete Force of Men Working Fourteen Hours per Day to Rush Job to Completion.

E. E. TURNER WILL ASSIST

With His Maintenance Force to Construct Bridges So That Traffic Will Not Be Held
Up In Coming to Town

Working fourteen hours a day, means that the paving crew will just about reach the west end of St. Joe by Saturday night, or at least that is the goal set out for the week.

The work opened Monday morning at the Widney Corners, but they did not make the usual progress on account of the large square corner. By Thursday evening it is expected that they will be to the B. & O. crossing.

It is a bit of interest to see the speed with which construction of this character is carried on. But little of real labor is necessary following the mixer, as the latest machines follow up to complete the work.

Under favorable conditions they average about 115 feet per hour.

When they reach the business section of St. Joe, E. E. Turner, Superintendent of the County Highway Department will be here, ready to assist in the construction of bridges so that the traffic can be cared for, and that no one business will be hampered. Arrangements will also be made for traffic to use the berm in getting up and down the street, especially in entering town from the north.

The material is being hauled from the Wabash at Spencerville and the empty trucks are now using the grade, while the loads are being hauled over the west road.

PORCH AND LAWN PARTIES

Summer with its blue skies and rainbow-hued flowers, its warm breezes and dancing leaves, has called us out-of-doors again. Appropriate to the desertion of dining and living rooms are enticingly suggested porch and lawn parties.

A noonday luncheon on the screened-in side or front porch offers no end of opportunities to the hostess who is looking for an unusual way to entertain her club, to invite guests to meet an out-of-town friend, or to give a bridal announcement party. Porches are easy to decorate because they afford the natural out-of-doors background. A few tall shrubby branches to cover the posts and several tall baskets of flowers at intervals around the edges of the porch floor are all that is necessary. If there is a color scheme that one wants to carry out, a simple network of dark green crepe paper over the ceiling, from which are dropped bright colored Japanese lanterns, makes it possible.

If you have eaten supper with a group of friends in some one's garden after sundown on a summer evening, you know how en-

SHEER MOUSSELINES PARTNER WITH VELVET FOR FORMAL DRESS

IN THE new fashions, the contrast theme is as much a matter of materials as it is a matter of color.

Designers, in their endeavor to feature contrast show no hesitancy in combining weaves which are entirely foreign to each other. In fact, the more out of the ordinary the alliance, the smarter the results, according to the modern way of thinking.

Even the most conservative cannot but acquire a taste for these new effects as fashionists are presenting them this season. It is interesting, for example to see filmy white mousseline made up with black velvet, the flounces on the skirt alternating the two materials as shown to the right in the accompanying illustration. This charming evening dress is none other than a Worth creation.

For the "formal dress" ensemble also shown in the picture, Vionnet tops a white mousseline frock with a little tuxedo jacket made of sheer velvet in a deep red tone.

This feeling that two materials are better than one is in no wise confined to the formal evening mode, but the sentiment prevails throughout all fashiondom. Gingham partners with blue joyable it is. A garden is so restful and beautiful in the evening that any one who has one will want to serve several suppers there this summer. Garden suppers usually are served buffet style. The dishes, silver, and napkins are arranged at one end of the table in true buffet style and the foods are placed down the table in a manner convenient to the guests. For seats use garden furniture, which may be a yard swing, a bench or two, and a few chairs.

Late varieties of apples are more suitable for storing than are the summer apples.

Weeds reduce corn yields by competing for both moisture and plant food. Corn cultivation should be shallow, yet frequent enough to control weeds.

RURAL HOUSEWIVES
ORGANIZE FOR YEAR

The Rural Housewives were entertained at the home of Mrs. Laney Gee Tuesday afternoon, June 9. Thirteen members, only one member being absent, answered to roll call with something interesting about Coolidge.

Under business was election of officers as follows:

President, Mrs. Minnie Gee. Vice Pres., Mrs. Gladys Hart. Secretary, Mrs. Marie Trostel. Ass't. Mrs. Pluma Hamilton. Treasurer, Mrs. Mira Conine. Press Correspondent, Mrs. Pluma Hamilton.

There were two guests, Mrs. Cora Curie and Mrs. Jennie Abel. Mrs. Hazel Washler conducted the special number. The hostess served a very tasty luncheon. The next meeting will be held with Mrs. Marie Trostel, June 23rd, responses to be nursery rhymes.

DELIVERY MAN RETURNS AND GIVES SELF UP

Marion Lockhart, who, while employed as a delivery man for the Thomas Baking Co. of Auburn, left the city one Saturday afternoon taking a new Ford delivery truck and the collections he had made, returned Thursday night and gave himself up to the sheriff.

Lockhart disappeared several months ago. He went to Cincinnati, Ohio, and there put the truck in a garage. Winfred Thomas was notified by police that the company truck was in that city and was told where to find it.

Lockhart left the Ohio city and wandered about, finally going to California. He told Sheriff Hoff when he surrendered that he was tired of wandering and returned to have it over with. He is in jail on a warrant charging him with child abandonment.

BURNED BADLY
WHILE CLEANING CLOTHES

John C. Armstrong former sheriff of this county, was badly burned in a gasoline explosion late Monday afternoon at his home in Auburn. He was rushed to the Sanders hospital in the ambulance. His arms and legs are badly burned.

He was cleaning clothes in a wash tub in the basement. Friction from rubbing the clothes is thought to have caused the fluid to explode. He ran screaming from the house, his clothing partially burned off, and fell on the lawn in front of the house. The fire department was called and put out the small fire which started in the basement.

Have Proper Lighting in Living Room

Efficient Light for Reading.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

How often one goes into a home which is nicely furnished, well-arranged, and comfortable—except for the lighting! For a long time it was the custom to place a large center light in each room overhead and let every one use it to see what they were doing. It had to serve for reading newspapers, sewing, playing the piano, doing lessons, eating meals, dressing, cooking or washing dishes, depending upon the room and its purpose. Obviously several people in the same room could not all occupy good positions with regard to one overhead light. If, indeed, any of them did. Some would be in semi-shadow, yet unaware that they were straining their eyes and enjoying less comfort than they would have with light distributed to all parts of the room.

The essence of good modern lighting is to have your light concentrated where it illuminates what you want to see, without a glare. Correct lighting for one room differs from that for another. Buildings nowadays put several electric outlets in every room so that lamps may be attached in different parts of the room, and still be convenient when the furniture is rearranged. Even kerosene lamps can be placed on wall brackets and on stands wherever light is wanted.

A very bright source of light, whether electricity, gas, or other illumination, should be shaded. Clear glass globes can be replaced by frosted ones which diffuse the light. Indirect lighting is successful in some rooms, but lamp shades that direct light downward and concentrate it where it is needed are more popular with night readers.

In the living room there may be occasional use for a large central light that floods the whole room, but many people at the present time do not have one. Instead they use wall lights supplemented by a number of well-shaded floor and table lamps placed where they meet different needs. A lamp near the piano, at the writing desk, close to the book cases, and by each chair used for reading or studying, gives well-balanced arrangement of light in a living room. The illustration, taken by the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture, shows how comfortable and effective a well-shaded reading lamp may be when placed beside a roomy padded chair for reading. There is a bookstand close by which also serves as a small table for sewing, afternoon tea or for current magazines. The lamp is so placed that the light falls over the reader's left shoulder, and its shade is fitted to cast the light on one's book or work, never into the eyes.

To restore a white spot caused from heat, on a polished surface, rub lightly with alcohol. Bruised spots on dark furniture may be removed by rubbing with a walnut meat. Press the meat into the scratch or scar. If very deep, a bit of color may be needed to cover it.

In washing linoleum add a little vinegar to the water; it removes any grease that plain washing will not. A salad may be made more attractive by dipping the fluted edges of the lettuce leaves into paprika.

When gum gets on the furniture, cover with a blotter and press with a hot iron. When in small daughter's hair, that is quite a different matter. Cover the spot with lard and carefully rub and wipe away with a cloth.

To remove varnish and paint from woodwork add two tablespoonfuls of woodwork add two tablespoonfuls of lye to one quart of thick starch. Mix carefully and apply with a brush, using an old one. Leave on for forty minutes, then remove with cold water with an old paint brush. After allowing to stand for several days apply wood filler and varnish.

When food burns on granite or aluminum dishes, fill with cold water,

Slip Covers for Chairs, Good Protection

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Slip covers are attractive on bedroom chairs at any time. They protect the upholstery from dust and hard wear and provide variety in the room's decoration. In summer a crisp, fresh slip cover of semi-glossed chintz, gingham or percale, adds immeasurably to the impression of coolness and cleanliness of the room. In winter cretonne, terry cloth or rep, in warm colors, may be used to make the room appear comfortable, friendly and cheerful. The type of slip cover shown in the illustration is suggested by the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture as being suitable for a small upholstered chair in a bedroom. For removable covers or upholstery on small chairs, such as this one, choose material with a small design. Since the pattern in this material is an all-over one the cover can be fitted directly on the chair. Pin all parts together and mark the seam lines with chalk or pencil. The seams in this cover have been finished with seam cording of the same material to give them a trim appearance. The little ruffle around the lower edge makes a practical and pleasing finish but it should be short enough to clear the floor at least two inches. Accurate stitching and good fitting are essential in making furniture covers, for loose slips soon wrinkle badly and look messy and untidy.

As a slip cover of this kind is intended to be removed and washed occasionally it is made with a placket down the center back and closed with strong snaps. A sliding fastener could be used equally well, if preferred, either in the center back or in one of the seams joining the back to the sides.

Well-lighted rooms help to make a home cheery as well as healthful and efficient.

A closed, curtained shelf over the kitchen work table helps the housewife to save steps.

If you wish to iron a rug-dry garment in a hurry, dampen it with hot water, roll it tightly in a cloth and place it on a hot radiator or over the oven while the iron is heating.

Evening Story for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

THE PIG SCHOOL

The pigs all had their stone slates and their sharp stone pencils and were practicing their letters every little while.

They were writing beautiful big P's, for their family name, more often than any other letter.

Right on time came Peter Gnome, their teacher. He was wearing a tall green hat and green spectacles on his nose.

The gnomes had told him that his costume was rather gay for a teacher of pigs, but Peter had the idea that he must impress the pigs with cleanliness and attractiveness—for, as he so truly said, they would just as soon wear tall hats and tall boots of mud!

As for the fairies who came to see how Peter Gnome's funny school was getting along—they came dressed in soft gray dresses with gray wings and silver gray wands.

They had said they wanted to look like little school fairies.

Soon Peter Gnome began his teaching. All the little pigs stood up and recited in chorus the many wise things Peter had taught them all about; how clean and neat they should be in order to be thought well of—and to give people a different idea than that the very name of pig meant dirt and mud.

Then the pigs sang their school singing. Peter called it singing to encourage them.

But they often called it the Pigs' Bagpipe Orchestra. And some of the little pigs had become so proud of themselves since they had been going to Peter Gnome's school that they thought their equals were every bit as good as some bands.

After that Pinky Pig got up and with a very low bow said they would now give their one-act play for the benefit of the fairies, and in honor of their teacher, Peter Gnome.

Another pig waved a big, leafy branch before the fairies so that for a few moments they could not see what was going on.

Then the pig stopped waving his branch, and all the pigs came forth on a little stage made of moss.

They acted a very funny play called "Ham or No Ham."

Of course, they made Ham the villain of the play and No Ham was the hero—the very, finest pig in the school.

Then the Pigs Sang.

And they acted in such a funny way that the fairies were laughing at most every moment—until towards the end of the play they wept because Ham, the villain, was punished by being turned into a real ham for people to eat.

Oh, Peter Gnome's school was a great success for awhile. The pigs enjoyed playing and writing their letters in mud.

But after a time it became too great an effort and the weather became so warm.

So Peter Gnome said they would all have a summer vacation. He was not sure whether he would continue the school in the fall.

The pigs, after all, didn't care so very much about being wise. And they said they had nothing great in the way of a career or future, so why go to so much trouble?

And there was good sense to that. Don't you think so?

Two Kinds of Ice Cream Easily Made at Home

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Here are two kinds of ice cream which may be new to you. Both are easily made if you have a freezer, and the ingredients can be obtained almost anywhere. The recipes are from the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Peppermint Ice Cream.

1½ pints single cream ¼ tsp. salt 1½ pints double cream 8 drops essence of ½ cup sugar 1 peppermint
Heat a half cupful of the single cream, add the salt and sugar, and stir until the sugar has dissolved. Mix with the rest of the cream and add sufficient coloring to make a soft green, and enough peppermint essence for delicate flavoring. Use a freezing mixture of one part salt and four to six parts of ice and turn the freezer slowly. After freezing, remove the dasher, pack the freezer with more ice and salt and let stand for an hour or more to ripen. Serve with hot chocolate sauce.

If a less rich ice cream is desired, use all single cream.

Peanut Brittle Ice Cream.

1 quart single cream 1½ to 2 cups of ground peanut
¼ cup sugar ¼ tsp. salt
Heat one cupful of the cream to the boiling point, add the sugar and the ground peanut brittle, and stir until well blended. Mix with the remaining cream, and the salt. Use a freezing mixture of one part salt and four to six parts of ice and turn the crank of the freezer slowly. After freezing, remove the dasher, pack the freezer with more ice and salt, and let stand for an hour or more to ripen.

Save Silk Underwear.

Acids in perspiration weaken silk fibers and must be removed by frequent laundering if the best service is to be expected, advises the New York state college of home economics at Cornell university. When laundering use a mild soap, lukewarm suds, and rinse thoroughly in lukewarm water. Because glove silk underwear, no matter how it is washed or how good the quality, usually shrinks, buy a size which is large enough and pull it to the right size while it dries, they advise.

Sheer Velvet for the Bride's Gown

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Whether the summer bride be arrayed in traditional satin or the very new chalk white lace or the thin-as-chiffon transparent velvet which is so beloved by the present generation, exquisite simplicity distinguishes her costume.

From her headpiece and veil draperies to her bridal bouquet, every detail is made to emphasize sophisticated simplicity. In view of this fact the bride is carrying bouquet, an armful of calla lilies whose chaste and classic lines add exquisite artistry to the picture.

The amazing sheerness and suppleness of modern velvet speak eloquently in its favor as a medium for the nuptial gown. It is ivory transparent velvet of finest texture which fashions the lovely wedding dress in the picture. The bodice of this softly draped frock is delicately embroidered with tiny rhinestones.

The tulle veil falls in classic silhouette from a simple band of pearls. The sleeves are long, almost completely covering the hand and the skirt is made to touch the floor in front, and the train is moderately long.

For the costume of the maid of honor, as portrayed in the center panel, soft orchid mousseline is the choice. It is made over a layer of self fabric, with blue crepe de chine slip which faintly tinges the orchid mousseline. Piped over this is a little jacket with triple poppins which are bound in orchid. The hat is of pale blue starched mousseline, with a band of orchid velvet tying in a flat bow in the back.

Gowns for the bridesmaids, a model of which is shown to the right, are made of starched mousseline in pale yellow. The fact that the mousseline is stiffened is significant in that it adds a sprightly touch which is charming. The princess bodice has a narrow tied belt of self material. It is embroidered with tiny rhinestones similar to the design which decorates the bride's gown. The shoulder applique treatment is one of the attractive points of this frock. It consists of several petals which completely cover the shoulder.

The hat worn by this bridesmaid is of the starched mousseline, wide-brimmed and very simple in outline as the picture shows. The hands which encircle the crown and tie in the back are of the same mousseline. Soft suede gloves and satin slippers in matching yellow are worn.

"Little Stories for Bedtime"

by Thornton W. Burgess

REDDY FOX WAS HUNGRY

FROM a safe distance on the bank of the Smiling Pool the little people of the Green Meadows and the Green Forest had watched the Red Terror in the Old Pasture, and a great fear had filled every heart and had drawn all together. Reddy Fox had no desire to harm Danny Meadow Mouse and Danny knew it and sat right at Reddy's feet. Old Man Coyote had not thought of touching Peter Rabbit and Peter knew it and hopped about excitedly right in front of Old Man Coyote. It was just the same way with all the little people. Fear of one another was wholly forgotten in the greater and common fear of the Red Terror.

So they watched Farmer Brown and Farmer Brown's Boy and other men fighting the Red Terror and hoped with a great hope that they would be able to beat it out before it should reach the Green Forest. They saw the fire sweep on and on toward the Green Forest, and their hearts sank, for if the Red Terror should destroy the Green Forest as it was destroying the Old Pasture many of them would be homeless, and then what should they do? Where could they go?

The Red Terror had almost reached the edge of the Green Forest when they saw Old Mother West Wind hurrying as fast as ever she could. They watched her blow with all her might, and they saw that she was blowing the Red Terror back. They heard the ugly growl and snarl of the Red Terror as it vainly tried to reach the Green Forest, and then they saw it suddenly and slowly retreat into the blackened and smoking Old Pasture, and they knew that Old Mother West Wind had saved the Green Forest.

Then, as the way with most of us, the moment they knew that there was nothing more to fear from the Red Terror they straightway forgot their great fright and began to think of other things.

"I believe I'm hungry," said Reddy Fox, and looked at Danny Meadow Mouse with such longing in his eyes that Danny suddenly felt a cold chill. "There comes a rain cloud! That will make an end of the Red Terror!" cried Danny.

Reddy looked up in the sky. Sure enough, there was a black rain cloud being hurried along by some of the Merry Little Breezes. When he looked down again Danny Meadow Mouse was nowhere to be seen. Peter Rabbit, happening to look at Old Man Coyote, saw Old Man Coyote's mouth water, and suddenly decided that it was high time that he and little Mrs. Peter were back in the dear Old Brier Patch.

"There comes Farmer Brown. That means that there is nothing more to fear from the Red Terror," cried Peter. Old Man Coyote turned to look toward the Old Pasture. Sure enough Farmer Brown and the men with him were coming, leaving only Farmer Brown's Boy to keep watch. Peter was right; there was nothing more to fear from the Red Terror.

"I believe I could eat a fat rabbit," muttered Old Man Coyote to himself and turned to look for Peter. But Peter and little Mrs. Peter and old

"I Believe I'm Hungry," Said Reddy Fox.

Jed Thumper, the gray old rabbit who was Mrs. Peter's father, were already half way to the dear Old Brier Patch.

It was the same way with all the other little people. The instant the great common fear was removed the bigger people began to think of their stomachs and the littlest people knew that they were no longer safe until they reached their homes.

"It's too bad," muttered Peter as he led the way to the dear Old Brier Patch, "that we can't trust each other all the time as we did when the great fear was upon us. It's queer, too. I don't quite understand it."

But that is one of the things that wise heads than Peter's have puzzled over.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

SHAKING HANDS OVER A GATE

"DON'T shake hands across a gate," say the superstitious—"It means bad luck." This superstition is especially common in the South. It would seem to be based upon the idea of obstruction and entanglement so common in many forms of sympathetic magic—a primitive idea. We will more easily understand the superstition remembering that axiom of sympathetic magic which says: "An association in thought is an association in fact."

People living in a primitive state still "hold by it." Thus when the sun of the Arctic day appears above the horizon Eskimo children are forbidden to play that universal game of cat's cradle lest the sun should become entangled in the meshes of the "cradle" and his rising be retarded. When two persons shake hands it is a sort of reciprocal interchange of ego—a partial transference of personalities or at least of sentiment. But most gates are of the picket barred variety and this flow of personality between the two hand-shakers, one on one side the gate and one on the other, is liable to be obstructed—to get entangled in the pickets or bars just as the Eskimo's sun gets entangled in the "cat's cradle." Therefore it is "bad luck" so to shake hands. The persistence of primitive ideas in modern superstitions and the value to archaeology from a study of those superstitions is thus testified to by the Egyptologists.

"TO BE ON THE ANXIOUS SEAT"

"THEY kept him waiting on the anxious seat for a long time before he was finally assured of the position."

This is the present and usual use of the expression "anxious seat" which, strictly speaking, should be "anxious bench."

A person who is on the "anxious seat" or "anxious bench" does not really sit. It is a reference rather to a mental state than to a physical position. This mental state may be one of worry, concern, depression or anxiety. Originally, the phrase was purely ecclesiastical. It had its inception in the practice at Methodist and other religious revivals in the United States, to have special benches set aside for use only by those members of the congregation who had repented of their previous lives and who felt that they would be saved only by joining the church.

It was these benches that came to be known as "anxious benches." Because those who sat upon them were quite anxious pending their notification of admission into the church.

The Old Gardener Says:

IT IS not advisable to wait until late autumn before transplanting delphiniums. They give best results when moved in late summer. New plants are readily grown from seed if the seed is fresh. Delphiniums do not resent a certain amount of shade from the midday sun but should not be grown actually under or too close to trees. Established plants will persist for several years but it is wise to keep a new lot coming on to provide for future needs. When the plants are growing in hot sandy soil it is advisable to apply a mulch of well decayed leaf-mold or peat-moss, or some form of humus to keep the ground cool and moist.

For Meditation

By LEONARD A. BARRETT

PROSPERITY

IN THE world of economic values certain laws work for prosperity, while other laws bring about depression. In the years prior to 1929, the majority of people who were riding on the crest of the wave of prosperity took little thought of any development or experience that was not directly related to their own social or financial welfare. The prevailing spirit was that the fittest would survive, while the weak would ultimately be forced out of the race. Every thing during those years was running at topnotch speed. Fabulous prices were paid for things purchased to satisfy a mere whim rather than a human necessity. Wages were high. Everybody had plenty of cash. Day laborers were receiving more for their work than in many a decade. Increased dividends and split stock values brought increased revenues to financial investors. The entire period has been characterized as an orgy of speculation. Perhaps it would be more to the point to say it was an orgy of greed and selfishness.

L. A. Barrett.

Then came the crash. The months of October and November, 1929, will never be forgotten by those who were in touch with financial affairs. Fortunes were lost in a day. No mercy was shown those whose cash reserves were not sufficiently large to enable them to stem the current. The tragedy of it all was not the loss of fortunes so much as the loss of moral reserve power. Persons whose world of experience was limited by economic values only turned on themselves and committed suicide. It was a terrible thing which reckless prosperity took for its orgy of speculation. Then followed the inevitable depression from which business for the last eighteen months has been gradually digging itself out. Shattered confidence is giving way to hope and encouragement and the beginning of a business revival seems in the making.

In no lesson to be learned from all this bitter experience? Yes—the most important factor in the economic world is not balance sheets and cash but men and women. The most important thing in men and women is not their earning power but the moral reserve power in the hearts expressed in the willingness to help another, to cultivate the love of home and the desire for education, health and religion. Without these factors there can be no real prosperity or true happiness.

LIVE STOCK NEWS

SHARE FEEDING IS GAINING SUPPORT

Of Interest to Growers and Feeders of Stock.

With live stock prices exceptionally low and feeding operations difficult to finance, both growers and feeders of cattle and sheep in some parts are considering share-feeding plans.

To call attention to some of the important points that should be considered at the start in forming such a contract, the extension service of the Colorado Agricultural college has outlined what it believes is a fair and equitable arrangement, based on the relative investment of grower and feeder. These suggestions have been prepared by E. J. Maynard and L. H. Rockford. Copies will be sent free to anyone interested.

Experience in other states indicates that only in times like the present do producers and feeders "get together" on a share basis.

According to the plan, the grower and feeder agree on the inventory value of the live stock delivered to the feed lot, based on the current market price of feeders of similar grade and weight. They also agree on prices of feeds to be used which will be measured or weighed to the live stock by the feeder. Both parties agree to the ration to be used and method of feeding and handling of stock during the feeding period.

Mention is made of the interest charges, compensation for labor, investment in feed yards, shelter and equipment, length of feeding period and gain. Death loss, shipping and selling expenses are shared jointly by each.

The plan includes a detailed example of the financial plan for feeding 1,000 lambs, 100 two-year-old steers or 100 calves.

Pit Silos Are Popular

in Feeding Live Stock

(By WALTER G. WARD, Extension Architect, Kansas State Agricultural College.)

Kansas farmers are finding the use of the pit silo most economical in their cattle feeding enterprise. The pit silo should have a concrete or masonry collar beginning three feet or more below ground to avoid frost action and extending three or four feet above ground to increase the capacity. The wall above ground will also serve as a protecting wall to keep animals from falling into the silo when it is empty.

Below the collar the silo should be dug with smooth, true walls and plastered with a mortar consisting of one part cement to three parts of clean, coarse sand. To this mixture should be added hydrated lime equaling 10 per cent of the cement used. If the ground shows any tendency toward settling it is advisable to use reinforcement, such as woven wire fencing or ball screen.

About the only serious disadvantage to a pit silo is in the removal of the silage, which necessitates the use of some kind of a hoist. If the hoist is made with sufficient capacity that only one trip into the silo is required at each filling, this does not offer such a difficult problem.

Big Value of Skimmilk for Fattening Swine

According to a summary taken of trials conducted at various experiment stations, when corn is worth 50 cents a bushel and tankage is worth $50 a ton, skimmilk will have a value of about 20 cents a hundred pounds when fed to hogs. With corn at 70 cents and tankage at $50, the skimmilk would be worth about 32 cents a hundred. This should give you some idea about the value of skimmilk in relation to the prices you must pay for feeds.

The best experimental data available indicate that whole milk is worth only about twice as much as skimmilk for fattening hogs. It is not as good for young pigs as skimmilk for its high fat content is apt to cause digestive troubles.

Soybean Hay Superior for Fattening Lambs

Soybean hay cut at the right time contains the food nutrients in fairly good proportion for fattening lambs. But lambs should not be fed on a bulky ration entirely, there should be some concentrate (grain) with it to get the best results.

Corn and oats for grain and soybean hay would make a splendid ration. With corn silage the grain ration should contain a high carrier of protein like oil meal, wheat bran, etc., with corn and oats to give the most economical results.

Keep Flies Away

There is nothing better than pin tar to keep away the gad fly. A reader suggests that we tell some easier way, as the labor of catching them every two or three days is considerable. If one will construct a salt trough on the plan of a self-feeder you can smear some tar where the sheep's nose must come in contact with it. You make a trough with holes for the sheep to get the salt through and by keeping tar around the openings, you can expect.

Wealth Awaits Salvage by Treasure Hunters

The value of the eight thousand vessels sunk during the World war is estimated at six thousand million pounds, a sum calculated to stir all the resources of adventure ancient or modern. The recovery of all this treasure is open to anybody who can provide the means and the enterprise. With the progress of underwater science, it is not stretching probability too far to anticipate that a very real industry will one day start in the form of treasure hunting under the sea.

Among the principal wrecks that await the diver are those of Wilhelm der Zweiter wrecked off the coast of Africa, with 8,700 bars of silver, the Florentian in the bay of Tobermory, with bullion valued at $3,000,000, the Lizard, sunk near Cornwall, with a cargo of gold valued at $14,000,000, the Thunderbolt, with $4,400,000, the Honcoop, with 2,200 tons of copper, off the coast of Africa, the San Pedro, in Margaria channel, off Central America, with a cargo of golden images and precious stones valued at $6,000,000, the Merida, off the Virginia coast, with precious metals valued at $200,000, and the Lusitania, off the South Cork coast, which is reputed to contain close on three million pounds worth of gold and valuables. There is also, among many others, the Arabic with treasure of about $1,000,000.—Montreal Family Herald.

Achievement is Easiest in Field of Education

Among all the callings and professions available to young men, teaching offers the shortest and easiest road to a place at the top of the ladder, according to computations made from a study of "Who's Who" by Freling Foster.

"My purpose was to find an index to the opportunities for real achievement existing in different kinds of work," he explains in Collier's Weekly. "Therefore I tabulated the varying number of years that elapse between graduation and inclusion in Who's Who, for the various recognized occupational classes."

His final figures show that educators require an average of eighteen years to be recognized. The similar period for scientists is twenty years, writers twenty-two years, editors twenty-four years, physicians and surgeons twenty-five years, artists twenty-six years, lawyers thirty years, and business men thirty-one years.

World War Money

Many curious expedients were resorted to during the World war in order to prevent people of some war-torn nations from resorting to individual barter. The baser metals were used sometimes in place of gold and silver, often being gilded in order to carry out better the illusion of value. Printed wood was also compressed pulp. Silk, linen and velvet were among some of the novelty fabrics used. Stamped leather was used, and postage stamps were encased in transparent cases and circulated as currency.

For small change, shoe nails were sometimes used as makeshift money, these being issued by local post offices here and there in some European countries.

North Pole Shifting

Now we can truthfully say that the North pole is coming our way. For the North pole is actually moving south toward the Arctic coast of North America. A bulletin issued by the National Research council says this theoretical top of the world is coming our way at the rate of seven inches a year. While the cause of the shifting is unknown, W. D. Valuable autographs occur in the most unexpected places, and it pays to keep one's eyes open. Recently an invalid, going through an old volume, found a letter bearing the signatures of a number of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. ### Moving Cityward

PLAIDS OUTLINED IN A SINGLE COLOR ON DARK BACKGROUNDS

THERE must be at least one plaid dress in the fashionable spring wardrobe, not forgetting a plaid blouse, together with a whole collection of accessories which must include a scarf or two—either one of the new big squares or the popular ascot which ties so smartly close up about the throat. A "sporty" matching plaid hat is also a chic gesture to which add a pocketbook of the plaid for the ensemble which is complete in every detail.

In the new fabric collections there is a plaid for every mood. The plaid in the picture is very choice, having been designed by one of a group of artists who have turned their attention away from painting landscapes and portraits for a brief moment, in the interest of fabric design.

Note the artistic touch in this particular plaid which is printed in a single bright color on a dark background—not a crude straight line in it, the motif resolving itself into a series of undulating curves which are the very quintessence of grace. This patterning tends to introduce a simpler effect in plaids, so that even the most conservative can wear them with confidence.

This plaid is particularly smart in navy and white, such as has been used for the styling of the tulle frock pictured. The fair for navy and white is a rival, however, in brown and white, a contrast which is being made much of throughout the couture showings of Paris at present.

An interesting development is the twin effects, that is, a plaid worked out in light on a dark ground is used with a plaid which reverses the order of colors. Dresses which have their yokes or top portions made of plaids on a light background, the lower portion being of the darker tone patterning, answer to the call of smart fashion.

STATE FIRE MARSHAL GIVES REGULATIONS FOR FIREWORKS SALE

State regulations for the sale and distribution of fireworks of all kinds during the Fourth of July season are announced by Alfred Hogston, state fire marshal. ### Frankish Old Styles

Women had no monopoly of mean-looking and ugly styles in the time of Queen Elizabeth, says an article in a Boston paper. Men, too, were tightly laced into wasp waists. Their legs were free, but their necks were held by a stiff ruff and the whole upper half of their costume was furled and frilled until it was anything but a practicable garment.

Lesson for June 21

THE SIN OF CAUSING OTHERS TO STUMBLE (Temperance Lesson)

GOLDEN TEXT—It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak. LESSON TEXT—Romans 14:13-23. PRIMARY TOPIC—Helping Others (Health Emphasis). JUNIOR TOPIC—My Responsibility for Others (Health Emphasis). INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Abstaining for the Sake of Others. YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Liquor Traffic a Stumbling-block.

This lesson sets forth fraternal duties in matters of conscience. The background for these obligations is found in the fact that there were some in the church at Rome who were very conscientious with reference to eating flesh. Others were without these scruples. They ate what was set before them without question. Then there were some who had particular regard for fast days and holy days, as the Sabbath, etc. There were still others who had made no distinction, regarding every day alike. It is readily seen in this light how differences and disputes would arise. The sure preventive of strife under such circumstances is Christian love and forbearance. The biblical unit embracing this discussion covers chapters 14:1 to 15:13. It will be seen that it is taken from the practical portion of the Epistle. These practical exhortations are based upon the great truths of saving grace set forth in the doctrinal portion of Romans.

1. Neither Party is to Sit in Judgment Upon the Other (Rom. 14:1-13). This instruction applies to things indifferent in themselves. It would be a mistake to apply these principles to such actions as are inherently wrong. Concerning things which are morally indifferent, passing judgment on another is wrong because:

1. Each man is responsible to God alone (v. 4). Each man belongs to God.
2. Each man must decide for himself what is right for him to do (vv. 5, 6). Touching matters indifferent in themselves, an action which is right for one may be sinful for another.
3. Each man lives not to himself, but unto the Lord (vv. 7-9). The one joined to Jesus Christ is to be governed by the Spirit of Christ.
4. Each man must give an account of himself to God (vv. 10-13).

a. Each one must stand before the judgment seat of Christ (v. 10).
b. Account must be rendered unto God (v. 12). Nothing can be concealed from him, for he is omniscient.

II. A Stumbling Block Should Not Be Placed in the Way of Another (Rom. 14:14-23).

A properly enlightened Christian may have perfect liberty to act in a given way as far as he himself is concerned, but the exercise of his liberty may become an occasion of stumbling to another. The urgent reasons for abridgment of liberties are:

1. We may destroy the weak brother for whom Christ died (v. 15). If it was worth while for Christ to die for a man surely it is worth while that the Christian should deny himself some privilege for his brother's sake.
2. We should not allow our good to be evil spoken of (vv. 16-18). Liberty in Christ is a precious thing which only love knows how to use. That one is in the Kingdom of God and, therefore, ruled by the Holy Spirit is proved by daily living the love life which is characterized as follows:

- a. Righteousness, honesty and integrity in all things.
- b. Living in peace with each other.
- c. Joy in the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost is represented as the "oil of gladness" (Heb. 1:9).

3. We should follow after things that make for peace and edify one another (v. 19). To ignore the conscientious scruples of a weak brother is to destroy the work of God—to pull down the gracious work which God is doing in him.

4. We should exercise our faith in God and abstain from things which offend the weak brother (vv. 21-23).

III. We Should Please Our Neighbor and Not Ourselves (Rom. 15:1-13). The infirmities of the weak are real burdens which are to be borne by the strong.

1. Because of Christ's example (vv. 1-3). He is our supreme pattern. His supreme thought and purpose was to help and save others.
2. Because of the Scripture testimony (vv. 4-13). The Old Testament Scriptures abound with examples of self-denying sacrifices for the good of others, having their culmination of meaning in the action of Christ.

Hamburg and Luebeck

Scene in the Port of Hamburg.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

MEMORIES of the prosperous era of the Hanseatic league are stirred by the proposal for joining the one-time Hanseatic cities of Hamburg and Luebeck. The cities, which were both leaders in the old league, lie only about 40 miles apart in northeastern Germany, one on the Elbe river near its mouth into the North sea, and the other on the River Trave, only ten miles from the Baltic sea. The object of the association of the two ports would be to eliminate competition and to overcome the effects of the depression that both have felt.

Hamburg is both a free port and a free city; and he who sees Hamburg quickly learns that both appellations have practical consequences. The visitor starts forth, wisely enough, to see Hamburg's best advertised spectacle, its harbor. He finds it has not been overrated. It is one of the most amazing industrial spectacles in the world; that vast sweep of cluttered water, pierced by hundreds of land fingers separating the rectangular water sheets which are basins, skylined by monster skeletons of mighty ships in the building, often smoke-screened by the chimney outpourings of myriad factories.

For six miles along the broad Elbe, 75 miles up-river from the sea, extend the massive docks, the hippodrome landing stages, the intricate jumble of cranes, derricks, and elevators. The landing stages are necessary because Hamburg has an "open harbor," accessible to the tide, in contrast to the dock-basins and flood-gates of much of the Port of London.

A ferry is the proper sightseeing vehicle. For the port is a 15-square-mile area, strewn with every type of modern vessel, from huge ocean liners down through lazy barges, alert yachts, energetic motorboats, chugging tugs, and busy ferries.

"You have your pass, of course," inquires the master of the "circular ferry"—"circular" applying to the trip, not the craft.

"A pass, what for?"

"A part of this harbor is a free port, sir," patiently explains the boatman. "And you will wish to come back."

What the Free Port Means.

You get your pass, your boatman threads his way for miles and miles through a floating traffic jam, but in it is worth while for Christ to die for a man surely it is worth while that the Christian should deny himself some privilege for his brother's sake.

You understand the need for the pass, and you realize, too, that you have just seen one key to the prosperity of the foremost continental port.

The huge free port, with its mammoth warehouses, cluttered with silks from China, beef from Argentina, coffees from Brazil, harvesters from the United States, all bearing addresses for transshipment to strange-named Baltic ports, none to pay a cent of duty into Germany's treasury.

One-third of Hamburg's harbor, you later learn, is given over to this free port; in its zone are employed some 20,000 of the city's 110,000 industrial workers.

Hamburg entered the German customs union in 1888, thus enabling it to sell its own goods to Germany, tariff free, but its canny senate maintained its free port privileges, which arrangement makes it the great trans-ocean department store of the Baltic.

Is a senate in a city? Yes, a senate which clings to its stiff Spanish dress as loyally as it guards the ancient rights and privileges of the free city—the "Free and Hanseatic City of Hamburg."

There are only three German survivors of that mightiest Hanseatic mercantile chain of the Middle ages—Bremen, Luebeck and Hamburg. Of these three the mightiest is Hamburg. Once the senators of Hamburg were elected for life. Their rule of Hamburg was as autocratic, to our modern way of thinking, as that of the doges of Venice. That has changed now.

There is a house of burgesses, giving a legislative balance much like that under the United States' capitol dome. Where Hamburg's Senate Sits. The senate sits in the town hall. Perhaps you have heard of the famous Ratsweibkeller, beneath the central building, with its jolly stone Bacchus frankly enthroned at the entrance to a vestibule adorned with stained glass window portallures of the John Paul Joneses of maritime Hamburg. You climb aloft. The peculiar walls catch your eye. They seem to be of solid wood, most delicately carved and beautifully decorated. Closer examination shows some to be felt, pressed to the hardness and likeness of wood, with the intricate patterns imposed by a matrix.

And after a banquet hall that conjures up memories of the beited burgesses, the staunch merchants and the gentleman adventurers of medieval times, you come upon the senate chamber. One feature strikes a home note in the American bosom. This senate, too, has secret sessions. But when it does, it retires from the chamber with the visitor's gallery and the press gallery into a smaller chamber that has just one entrance. That entrance is guarded by two massive doors of incredible thickness.

Dating back to Charlemagne, Hamburg is Germany's most modern city. Almost modernistic. The fire of 1842 left few traces of its medieval architecture. Some of its newer office buildings have spiraled sides, in northern search for sunlight; others have contours that make them loom up in Hamburg vistas like a giant Europa entering a narrow harbor.

In these office buildings are elevators which have dispensed with doors and operators. They run on the chain principle, like buckets in a well. They do not stop. One hops on or off as the "buckets" pass the floor. If one forgets to alight at the right floor, no harm done. Stay on, and you will be carried around the top or bottom of the shaft as on a ferris wheel.

Busy but Beautiful.

Industrial to its finger tips, militantly so, Hamburg is a beautiful city. It leaves a confused impression of Minneapolis and Venice. For the Alster river, en route to the Elbe, displays wide in the midst of Hamburg's busiest quarter, giving it the unique spectacle of great office buildings, fine hotels, fashionable shops, all along the lake front. Clerks in the great, gray stone building which is the office of the Hamburg-America line, glancing up from their ledgers, can look out over a glistening sheet of water, flecked with tiny yachts, motorboats, scurrying ferries, racing shells, and canoes; with swans and sea gulls hovering about.

By night the hotel visitor can view from his window the moonlit water, rimmed by thousands of electric bulbs, and see tiny fiery points of light bobbing all over the surface. At one corner are huddled hundreds of canoes, their occupants reclining on cushions, listening to the concert of the Alster pavilion. This sprightly cafe, or coffee house along the lake front, gathers its daytime patronage from the great department stores of the opposite side of the street.

Luebeck's Commerce and Romance.

Luebeck, companion port of the north, became, during the World war, the foremost port of the German empire in foreign, water-borne trade. It is the smallest of the free cities of Germany, but richer in reminiscences of former greatness than either of the other two. Hamburg, Bremen and Luebeck joined the modern German empire as free and independent Hanseatic cities. Hamburg and Bremen have developed into great stone-and-mortar hives of present-day business; have multiplied their wealth at a tremendous rate; and have, more and more, grown to the international type of purely business cities. Luebeck, on the other hand, while it has maintained an importance as a busy place of commerce, is medieval, romantic, a breath from the past.

Lying ten miles from the Baltic sea, on the River Trave, the channel of which has been so improved that boats of 16-foot draft are able to tie up at the city's docks, Luebeck has been a nerve center of North German trade with Denmark, the Scandinavian lands, and with Russia. The city has been made into an island by its harbor improvements, the Trave flowing around its western border and a wide canal around it on the east.

This city enjoys a location as favorable as that of Bremen or Hamburg for the distribution of its wares over Germany. It is reached by rail in two and one half hours from Bremen, and is about as conveniently near to Berlin. The port is connected with Copenhagen, Stockholm and Danzig by regular steamer services. Its chief articles of commerce are wines, especially clarets, timber, tar, and northern consignments of German manufactures.

THE STORY

With his English wife, Catherine, and son, Jeems, Henry Bula, French settler in Canada in 1760, cultivated an adjacent to the Tontore seigneurie. As the story opens the Bula's are returning from a visit to the Tontore.

CHAPTER I—Continued

He had stood this hour and still kept Marie Antoinette in his thoughts, for there was no other child to help fill the place. But since last autumn, when Madame Tontore's sister and her son Paul had come to the seigneurie, his dreams had grown more clouded until, on this Thursday afternoon, they were replaced by grim and merciless visions of a future vengeance on the young man who laughed at him and humiliated him, and who, without any grace whatever that he could see, basked warmly in the smiles and graciousness of Marie Antoinette's favor.

He was glad when his mother and father paused to rest on the edge of a great rock near the trail, for this interval gave him opportunity to go on alone, and when he was alone he could tear and thrash Tontore's cousin in a much more admirable way than when the others were tramping close at his heels. Suddenly Odd stopped so that his gaunt body made a barrier against Jeems' knees. They stood at the edge of a flower-strewn open among the chestnut trees. It was a hundred yards across this sun-filled playground of the wild, and on the far side of it, concealed in the bushes, Jeems knew there was game of some kind.

He dropped to the earth and drew himself behind the decaying mass of a monster log that had fallen a hundred years before. Odd crouched at his side with his muzzle level with the top of the log. Thus a minute passed, and after that another, and more on and on, yet Odd gave no sign of discouragement, nor did Jeems. He watched the far side of the clearing on a line as straight as a die with the pointing of Odd's nose.

Another minute of this rattling stillness, and a magnificent turkey cock strutted majestically into the sun. He weighed twenty pounds if an ounce, thought Jeems, a proud and immaculate bird, defying all the world in the empty open. In this moment Jeems thought again of Paul Tache, for the Quebec boy was like this turkey cock, always flaunting his clothes and displaying himself with the importance of a man.

Slowly Jeems withdrew the long-barreled gun from the top of the log and tautened the string of his bow. He waited until the big bird stood less than eighty yards away. An inch at a time he rose higher on his knees, and Odd's body grew stiffer with his movement. A choking sound came from the dog's throat as the long bow was bent. The twang of the string was like the ring of a steel tuning fork, and across the open spread grayish flash. There followed a mellow sound, a great commotion, a leaping of gorgeous color high into the air. Paul Tache, the turkey cock, was down and dying.

A moment later, Jeems and Odd stood looking down on the turkey cock, and Jeems' hand came more into the boy's face and eyes—here was not only a splendid dinner for tomorrow, but also, in his imagination, the first blow struck against his enemy.

The wild hot pride of youth and achievement possessed the lad as his father and mother came toward him. Here was triumph, and the boy's eyes lighted up when he saw his mother's interest in what he had done, and the unfeigned amazement in his father's face as he dropped his milled corn to the ground and looked down upon the magnificent turkey cock with the feathered arrow transfixing it.

Catherine regarded her boy unobscured by the two whose hunting instinct drew their eyes to the fallen game. Her own eyes were shining, and after a moment Henri saw what she was seeing and thinking and placed one of his big hands tenderly on his son's slim shoulder. Jeems was like his mother except for his blond hair and gray eyes, and in these two things he resembled his mother's brother, that worthless, wandering, always fighting and forever lovable vagabond, Hepsibah Adams. Henri's heart was happier at his wife's proud contemplation of her son, and he burst forth in praise of the lad's exploit.

"What a shot!" he cried, bending low to examine the bird and the arrow. "Straight through from wing to wing as clean as a bullet—and right up to the shaft of the feathers! I'd swear you did not have that straight arrow in your arm, lad! Yet the arrow was sped from back there at the edge of the open, you say? I scarce believe it! It is a shot for Captain Pipe and White Eagle and Big Cat, and not for you!"

These three were the Caughnawaga Indian friends who had taught Jeems to shoot, and it was Captain Pipe who had made his bow of choice seasoned ash.

They went on as the sun was setting behind the wilderness, and the golden pools of light grew dimmer about them and shadows grew heavier and more velvety dark among the trees. Through the woods, though the trail was narrow, Catherine walked with her hand in Henri's, and for half an hour they spoke no word except in whispers, and at last the four saw their home.

It lay in a sheltered dip which was like a diminutive child of the larger valley, a low and cheerful cabin of peeled logs, with more windows in it than a cautious man would have had, and with a huge chimney of clay and stone at the end. It was a home of beauty and comfort and luxury, as those things were measured on the frontier, and the best that Henri Bula could build. Catherine's love for this home was next to her love for Henri and her boy. Close about the cabin was her own domain—her flowers, her gardens of shrubs, her bird houses built of chestnut bark, her box hedges among the thinned-out with pretty paths edged with white-washed stones winding in and out among them.

Running up to the borders of these gardens were Henri's work fields, beginning first, because of Catherine's artistic eye, with the gentler growth of husbandry—carefully groomed and plotted soil for herbs and vegetables; and beyond lay the broader fields for heavier grains and foods, ten acres of well-tilled land in all, ending up against the hard maple wood out of which, in the preceding month of April, Henri had taken his year's supply of fifty gallons of maple syrup and four times as many pounds of sugar.

These precious possessions the four saw as they came down the green slope, and not one-half of them would Catherine have exchanged for all of Madame Tontore's riches. Catherine was smiling at her husband, and in Henri's eyes was an answering light of happiness, when out of the peace and beauty which lay about their home rose a piercing and blood-curdling cry—a cry which seemed to stop every sound that was in the air, a cry of monstrous depth and vastness, and with that cry a wild figure came toward them from its hiding place in the green shrubbery of Catherine's garden.

With a lurch of his shoulder, Henri sent the bag of corn to the ground, and while ahead of him Jeems swung his long gun into the crook of his arm and Odd stiffened and let out a sullen growl. The scraggy and mysterious figure advanced up the slope, and Jeems had looked to his flint and priming and stood with a ready thumb on the hammer of his weary gun when from behind her started a startled snap, then a little scream, and sped past her protectors to meet the advancing stranger with open arms.

"It's Hepsibah!" she cried. "It's Hepsibah!"

CHAPTER II

The stirring words had scarcely fallen from his mother's lips when Jeems laid his gun on the ground and ran after her, but with all his haste

Many Good Reasons for Use of Latin Mottoes

A writer has raised the question as to why the mottoes on shields and public buildings are in Latin and not in English. There is something in the point so far as recent creations are concerned, and if modern private individuals or public bodies want to display some profound truth on a shield there are reasons why it should be done in English; sometimes it is. The reason for so many Latin mottoes goes back to the foundations of civic life in Great Britain. The elegance of the Latin tongue apart, it was up to three centuries ago, an instrument of power, the language, too, of affairs, earnest, the recognized means of communication between the educated classes of Europe. It is not so now, but the vowel beauty of the Latin tongue dies hard. For example, "Ave Numerator she was in her brother's arms before he could overtake her, while his father, carrying the turkey cock but without the corn, came hurriedly out of his amaze and down to meet them.

If ever a man bore an affinity to an oak, with its cheer and strength and rugged growth, that man was Hepsibah Adams, the Indian trader. He was not as tall as Henri by half a head, nor did he have his leanness. His shoulders were wide and his body thick, and his face was as round as an apple and almost as red, with marks and scars of stress and battle set upon it, but in such a way that its vivacity and the good humor of its twinkling eyes were enhanced rather than spoiled by the vicissitudes of fortune.

When the excitement of first greetings were over, Catherine stood back from her jolly rogue of a brother and viewed him with a pair of eyes bright with affection, for she glowed at the same time with an appraising and speculative questioning which her lips at once put into words.

"Hepsibah, I am so happy to see you that it makes my heart choke, and yet I observe that you have not kept your promise to stop fighting, for one of your ears is nicked and your nose is crooked and there is a mark over your eye which was not there when I say you two years ago!"

Hepsibah's weather-stained face broke into a smile.

"I can't say as much for your nose, Catherine, for it grows prettier each year," he said. "But if a Dutchman's head should happen to come against it, as one hit mine in a little just in Albany town, why, I'll say there would be a bend in it, or no nose at all. And as for the ear with a nick in it, what can you expect from a Frenchman—excepting a sweet-tempered husband here—when he gets a chance to use his teeth instead of the hands which God gave him to fight with? The slit in the face is only a crease left by an Onondaga knife when he maled himself with the thought that I had got the best of a bargain, which I need not say, I'm a snorer! But is that all? Do you keep no better account of me than that? I am a bit ashamed of you, Catherine, for you have missed the important thing!"

"What is that?"

"My stomach," declared Hepsibah, holding his ample paunch with both hands. "It is sunk and shrunk, as you may clearly observe. It is dwarfed, shortened, circumscribed, and reduced—fairly warped and strangled from lack of food! And if I do not eat very soon—"

The rest was smothered in Catherine's arms and laughter.

"Dear old Hepsy! Hungry—always hungry, and you never will be any other way. So we shall have supper almost as soon as smoke can be made to come out of the chimney. I am so happy you have come!"

"And I," added Henri, getting in a word at last.

Jeems was tugging at the hand of his roving vagabond of an uncle, who was his greatest hero in all the world, and dragged him back to get his gun.

As they went, the happiness in Catherine's face was clouded for an instant.

"Best keep good eyes on our Jeems for a time, Henri," she warned. "Hep, you know very well, is a singularly imprudent and thoughtless man, overfilled with foolish tricks and contrivances most alluring to boyish minds, and of which, because of Jeems, I am a bit afraid."

But Henri only chuckled, for the thought was in his mind that it was a fascinating of one's good fortune to be taught tricks by a man like Hepsibah Adams.

Then Catherine saw that a film of smoke was rising from the top of the big stone chimney.

"Hepsibah has already started a fire," she said.

It was the aliveness of this fireplace which had drawn the expression of surprise and pleasure from Catherine—that and the aroma of cooking things which greeted them. Since Catherine's earliest memories, her brother had boasted of his excellence as a cook, and most assuredly he had been busy since his unexpected arrival. Half a dozen chains were dropped from their bolts in the thick oak lug-bar of the fireplace seven feet above the fire, and from the pothooks at the end of these chains were suspended as many as half a dozen steaming and bubbling and sizzling, and the sound of dancing water lids against which the bubbling water was playing an animated and pleasing melody. But to Henri, who always loved the sound of these busy pots with their lively cheer and promise of supper, a still more delectable thing was the great roast of venison which Hepsibah had hung before the fire.

On the basis of exterior appearance, this two-story bungalow house would be described as a colonial, and it is evident that, thus far at least, the designer followed the example of our early New England ancestors. The form is simply rectangular with a similar addition at one end providing for the sun room demanded by present-day standards and with a small lean-to addition at the rear sheltering the service entrance.

The walls are treated with the conventional lap siding, laid with wide exposure and painted in a light color in true colonial style. The entrance also adds its share to the colonial effect with its pleasing classic lines. The French door which admit one to the sun room from outside are a departure which in no way detracts from the harmony of the whole. It should be noted, too, that the style has been well preserved in the design of the garage, which may be seen at the rear, a wise measure in producing a really satisfactory residence.

But the moment that one steps inside this home, the colonial impression is lost, for there is no central hallway, that very essential feature of the true colonial design. However, the arrangement is one which will appeal and the prospective home owner need not feel that anything has been sacrificed by this departure. Six rooms and bath are provided, as well as a sun room opening off the living room and connected with it by a French door.

This living room occupies the entire front of the house with the exception of the space required at one corner for the entrance and stair hall. At the rear are the dining room and kitchen, while above stairs will be found three large bedrooms, all provided with closets and one with an enormous closet, which should delight the housewife who is ever in need of storage space.

On the left-hand wall of this corner let us place a picture about 14 inches high and 18 inches wide. This will hang so that as one standing in the room looks at it, the center of the picture will be just about at the level of the eye. Immediately below this will be placed a smaller picture, about 7 by 9 inches in size. These two pictures will quite well fill the wall and yet there will be plenty of light wall space all around them, as there should be.

On the right-hand wall space of this grouping we shall use a mirror for various reasons. If a picture were used there would perhaps be a feeling of overcrowdedness, or at least a feeling that too many pictures had been used.

Another reason for using a mirror is that the corner of the average room is naturally not particularly light and frequently needs something to brighten it up. More than anything else, a mirror will do this. Not only does it gleam in itself, but it repeats the rich glow of colors that are reflected from the wall. Therefore, we see two areas of color as we look at the corner—the brilliant orange and blue chintz lamp shade and its reflection in the mirror.

These color areas add immeasurably to the brilliancy of this part of the room. They attract attention to a corner that might otherwise have been flat and dull. The mirror has been placed in such a position that it not only reflects part of the lamp, but also part of the picture on the opposite wall. This is as it should be, for the duty of a mirror is to multiply the color notes in a room, making it a more animated and inviting place.

Corner Is Easy Part of Home to Decorate

Many women feel that a corner is a very difficult part of the room to make attractive.

In reality it is quite the easiest part of the room to decorate tastefully, because of the fact that there is a definite background provided; a background of lovely things that often a screen is used for lack of a wall.

The simplest arrangement for a corner is to place a round or an octagonal table there, and use with it a chair, either a Windsor, a coxwell or a comfortable wingback chair—at any rate a chair that one will love to read in. On the table there will, of course, be a lamp and books and the little things that make a grouping really a living thing.

But there must be more than this. On the walls of this corner there should be pictures. Without these the corner will be dead and uninvited. What kind of pictures, and what size pictures should be used there? In deciding, remember that the pyramid form is that toward which the artistic furniture always works.

In creating a grouping of furniture we strive toward the creation of a triangular area. Therefore, the pictures for this grouping must be smaller in width than the top of the table

Stucco Satisfactory When Properly Mixed

Prior to very recent years stucco was generally compounded by unskilled labor and applied in a more or less haphazard manner.

In recent years, however, much research work has been carried on and much has been done by large manufacturers of building materials toward bettering the quality of stucco and toward determining the proper classes and kinds of underconstruction over which it should be applied. The result is that today there is no reason to excuse why every stucco installation should not be entirely satisfactory and every stucco building a permanent structure.

It is erroneous to assume that a good stucco material can be compounded in a mortar box by throwing together cement, sand, lime and coloring matter, as is often done. The manufacture of stucco is a difficult problem and requires much machinery and equipment with which to grind, weigh, mix and measure the ingredients, also the knowledge of chemists and engineers who are thoroughly experienced in the business.

The ultimate answer, therefore, to the stucco question is the selection of a reputable material, the proper preparation of the underconstruction to receive the stucco and the application by mechanics who understand their business.

Filler, Wax, Dye Give Protection to Floors

The newest floor of the newest home must be protected against the onslaughts of Bobbie's sturdy-shod and active feet. For like many another form of beauty, floors are quickly marred, unless they are protected to withstand the tests to which every wear puts them.

To keep the fine color of such close-grained woods as pine, cypress, maple, birch or beech, the application of a paste wood filler in natural shade is applied. This fills the pores, gives a hard foundation, covers up defects and tones the wood to an even shade.

Finished with two coats of paste or liquid wax, these woods so treated stand an enduring floor which will stand many a hard knock from kiddy toes or Rover's claws.

For the colored effects which some find desirable, a coat of wood dye is applied, then lightly sanded. A finish of wax is, of course, used as a seal.

Fish and Game Club
Information

Fishing Season Opened June 16
June 16th marked the opening day of the fishing season in Indiana on large-mouth and small-mouth bass, silver bass, bluegills, crappies, yellow perch, pickerel, rock bass, red-eared sunfish and pike-perch. Trout may be lawfully taken from April first to August 31st.

There are no changes in the daily catch or in the size limits of these fish.

Predatory Fish
The four crews engaged in destroying predatory fish killed during the month of May 579 gar, 808 dogfish, 531 carp, or a total of 1418.

State Hatcheries

Riverside hatchery distributed 1,627,000 pike-perch fry during May. Tri-Lakes hatchery distributed 7,500,000 pike-perch fry and 2,070,000 yellow perch fry. Small-mouth and large-mouth bass started nesting in the hatchery ponds in the early part of May, but the activity was checked by a drop of temperature during the middle of the month and was again resumed in the latter part. The eggs were killed on the nests in the first period, but luckily they were few in number. Most of the eggs spawned in the last period have hatched. Bluegills, crappies, rock bass and red-eared sunfish are nesting at this time at the hatchery.

Pete Lavery, in charge of Bass lake hatchery, reports an exceptionally fine hatch of small-mouth bass at his place. He says the outlook for a successful season is very good.

Canadian Marshlands Drying Up

"Wild ducks now settling down to the business of rearing new families on the Canadian marshlands will be caught in mid-season by drouth conditions worse than those of last year, and a heavy percentage of ducklings and moulting adults will be destroyed unless saved by an unexpected amount of rainfall."

"Reports from observers show that the drouth is already closing in on the largest duck nesting areas of the continent. Water is already low in the marshes of Alberta and Saskatchewan. This is a bad sign and portends another cut in the number of wild fowl, whose ranks were slashed in half by last year's drouth. The marshes threaten to dry up before the young ducks are able to fly."

Pheasants

The Jasper-Pulaski and the Brown county Game Reserves are producing ringneck pheasants for this year's distribution. The first ringnecks hatched at both game reserves on the same day, May 14th. Since that time successful hatches have been coming off with regularity. Before the season closes more than 20,000 eggs will have been set. The weather has been favorable and the chicks are thriving. It is probable that distribution for stocking will be begun when the birds are 10 to 12 weeks of age. Statistics at the date of this bulletin are not at hand, but on June 1st the count stood as follows:

Ringneck eggs set, 17,740.
Ringneck eggs hatched, 5,720.

When Columbus Died

Christopher Columbus' will and other evidence indicate that he did not die in poverty, and that he was in possession of a considerable amount of wealth at the time of his death at Valladolid, Spain, in 1506. He was very much disappointed, however, that he was neglected by the court, but he was not in destitute circumstances at the time of his death.

Aged Letters in Door

Business letters mailed during the Nineteenth century, some 64, 66 and 67 years ago, were found in an old fashioned double-panneled front door when workmen removed it from offices in Manchester, England, recently. The missives had lodged in the space between the panels, behind which was the letter box. They were addressed to H. Barbour & Company, a thread company, which was merged with another firm many years ago.

Personal "I. Q."

The intelligence quotient or "I. Q." of a person is determined by multiplying the mental age by 100 and dividing by the actual age. Thus the intelligence quotient of a normal person is 100. A person with an "I. Q." below 80 is rated as subnormal, while one with an "I. Q." above 120 is rated as gifted. About five persons in 100 will be found to be 20 below normal and about five 20 above normal.

Coolness in the Tropics

Cruising in tropical waters is made more enjoyable for the crew of a British tanker by artificial showers from a sprinkler system which cools the decks and cabins.

DEKALB AWARDED HONORS AT MUNCIE CONVENTION

DeKalb county's twenty registered delegates returned Thursday night from Muncie where they attended the state Sunday school convention since Tuesday and reported additional honors for the DeKalb County Council of Religious Education.

This year the local county association was not only given the honor of being a "Gold Crown" county but the delegates brought back a flag and banner in recognition of being a one hundred per cent county. To win the special honor the county organization met all of the requirements of the state and international associations.

The convention was largely attended. Some idea may be gained from reports that at the opening session Tuesday morning the gymnasium where the sessions were held was filled. One thousand and young people attended the banquet Tuesday night.

Dr. Raymond Schutz of Manchester college was re-elected president and G. E. Baugnot was again elected vice president.

The 1932 convention will be held at Lafayette.

WOULD YOU PREFER THE GOOD OLD DAYS

In the days of hand reaping, which is still practiced in some parts of the world, the man cutting with a scythe is followed by a woman to gather the grain while another man follows to bind the sheaf. The three together can harvest only 1 1/2 to 2 acres a day. It then takes four men at least a day to thresh this out with the flail. If all modern machinery were wiped out and we should return to hand methods of farming, more than 90 per cent of the people would be required to feed our population. There could be no place for education, for cultural development or amusements except for a favored few. Farm homes would again be isolated, modern industries would languish, perhaps disappear, and there would be few telephones, radios, farm or home town papers.

TAX MONEY TO BE DISTRIBUTED TODAY

County Auditor Frank E. Lyon is ready to distribute on June 25 the sum of $543,876.74, representing the spring tax collections. This is $35,000 less than the distribution a year ago.

The collections reported this spring include $13,249.11 in delinquent tax. The delinquent a year ago was $16,934.

The state's share this spring is $69,166.80 and the county tax is $52,298.66. The latter is a reduction of $7,000 as compared with a year ago. For the county gravel road repair fund there is $29,847.95 and for county road bond an interest $21,329.01.

Among the towns and townships, many of the latter will get less money this spring than last year. The reductions including Butler, $3,300; Jackson, $2,383; Concord, $4,000; Spencer, $1,200; Stafford, $1,700; Wilmington, $3,925; Richland, $3,000; Fairfield, $1,000; Smithfield, $5,753; Keyser, $5,000 and Grant, $4,400. Auburn city gets $2,100 more and the Waterloo schools $3,000 less. The distribution to the other units is practically the same as in June, 1930.

The warrants to be distributed by the auditor follow:

Auburn schools $40,735.49.

OLDEST WOMAN IN DEKALB COUNTY DIES

Mrs. Sarah Phillips, 97 years of age, believed to be the oldest woman in DeKalb county, died Sunday night at 8:30 o'clock at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Samuel High, four miles west and south of St. Joe.

The aged woman had been sick two weeks. Death was the result of a rupture.

Mrs. Phillips was a native of Pennsylvania in which state she was born April 20, 1834, and she emigrated to DeKalb county with her parents when she was thirteen years old. The family of father, mother and five children traveled by wagon, settling west of Spencer.

She was married at the age of 21 to Thomas Phillips and he has been dead for a number of years.

Of the children, three are living. H. M. Phillips and Mrs. James Farver of Auburn, and Mrs. High with whom the deceased had made her home for the last nineteen years. Besides the children there is living a sister, Mrs. W. G. Walker of Hicksville, Ohio, four grandchildren and two great grandchildren.

Mrs. Phillips was a member of the Rebooth Church in Jackson township.

The funeral services will be held Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock from the Rebooth Church and burial will take place in Evergreen cemetery in Auburn.

At the annual Old Settlers' Day celebration for a number of years Mrs. Phillips registered as the oldest woman in DeKalb county.

ZACHARY BARKER, FORMER ST. JOE MAN, ARRESTED

Upon request of Sheriff John P. Hoff, Zachary Barker, formerly of St. Joe, a farmer living on the Yarnelle farm, was taken into custody at Chesapeake, O., Saturday and is being held in the county jail at Ironton, O., pending his removal to DeKalb county.

The warrant for Barker's arrest was based upon an affidavit signed by Herman L. Brown of Auburn, and filed in the DeKalb circuit court May 16 by Richard W. Sharpless, prosecuting attorney, charging perjury.

The complaint states that on April 9 Barker signed a false affidavit in which he claimed to be owner of certain personal property and that it was free from liens and encumbrances. In fact, the complaint states, Barker was not the owner of the property and was not in full possession of it and there were existing liens against it.

FORMER SPENCERVILLE MAN DIES AT NAPPANEE

Cassius M. Silberg, 73, a resident of Nappanee for 35 years died at his home at 5 A. M. Sunday after an illness of eight months. Mr. Silberg was born in Spencer, Ind., on January 12, 1858, and moved to Nappanee 35 years ago after a residence at Harlan. He was married in 1883 to Miss Lida J. Parent who survives with seven children, namely: Mrs. E. C. Finney of Fort Wayne, Mrs. Harry Eby of Bourbon, Mrs. Chas. C. Miller of Akron, O., Donald Silberg of Nappanee and the Misses Bertha, Ethel and Myrtle at home. He was a son of Michael and Catherine Silberg, early residents of northeastern Indiana. He followed the barber trade until his health failed.

The funeral was held Tuesday at 10:30 A. M. at the home with the Rev. J. H. Evans of the Evangelical Church and the Rev. F. A. Risley of the United Brethren Church officiating. Burial was made in the Union Center cemetery.

The tarring of many of the state gravel roads is now in progress and in Allen county a number of the county roads are being treated with tarvis.

CANNING KITCHEN TO OPEN AT ST. JOE

At last another of the needs of St. Joe and community has been met, and that is a custom canning kitchen.

Saturday, the Myers garage building was leased to Chas. A. Gillett, former owner of the Auburn Junction plant, by F. B. Leighty, who is acting as the receiver for the property.

Mr. Gillett will be assisted by A. A. Guilford, both experienced canning men, and at the present the property is being cleaned up and put in shape for business to open the first week in July.

The new industry will be known as the St. Joe Custom Canning Kitchen, and we feel as though the new business will be an asset to the community. It will afford employment for a number of ladies and just as fast as the business requires additional equipment Mr. Gillett says they will be ready to install it.

The work will be done by hand thus insuring the patrons the very best canning from the vegetables furnished.

If experience in this business means anything at all, we believe that the new concern can discontinue any of the nearby canneries in this respect.

As soon as the plant is ready for operation, the public will be made welcome, and we are sure that all will be treated courteously and everything will be done to merit your patronage, whether in large or small quantities.

A large dish of new peas and potatoes, steaming hot, well seasoned and decorated with sliced boiled egg, was presented to Mrs. Leighty for Monday dinner, by Mrs. Lillian Buckingham, and it was indeed appreciated by the Leighty's. It was the first of the Leighty's offering. We are all ready to pass judgment on such foods, and if our sanction and approval of the housewife's ability to prepare such eatables means anything, just send it over. Really those new garden vegetables were wonderful. The peas would melt in your mouth and the potatoes were of extra good size for home grown ones. Yes ma'am, you have our thanks. Mrs. Buckingham.

Jogalong Tales

CHAPTER 3

With a few backward looks at the industrious ants repairing their estate, the boy and the Jogalong hurried on. "Hello," suddenly exclaimed the Jogalong. "There's something beginning."

"Where, oh where?" cried the boy. Both the Jogalong and the boy had seated themselves upon the ground, cross-legged, the Jogalong took from one of his inside pockets a curious pair of spectacles.

"Here, boy," he said, "if you put these on you'll be able to see all that I can see. They're Curiously Spectacles and my, the things you can see through them are quite beyond all understanding."

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Jogalong," replied the boy. "You are very kind, but why are we sitting here? I thought you said something was about to begin to happen."

"And there it is," replied the Jogalong. "Look at that green thing in front of you."

"Why—that's only a plant," said the boy with a touch of disappointment in his voice.

"That can't do anything but grow, you know."

"Indeed?" answered the Jogalong. "And did you ever in your whole life see anything grow before? Did you ever see something start to grow or even completely grown, but without those Curiously Spectacles you could never actually see anything grow. Put them on, boy. You shall see that growing is no easy thing after all."

And sure enough, when he put on the Curiously Spectacles he could see wonderful things happening to the plant. Slowly the brown earth around it was rolling away, grain by grain, as if something underneath were squirming its way to the top. The green shoot pushed and pushed with great effort to free itself from the ground.

"See," said the boy. "It's all made of tiny veins, and chambers. And somebody must be pumping from under the ground, for water is running up and up and up through the veins. Oh, where is it all going?"

"Out," said the Jogalong. "Out, where?" asked the boy, looking at him in astonishment.

"Out into the air," said the Jogalong very knowingly. "After it runs through the veins, the plant is through with it, for it has given up all the food it contained and it must go out to make room for a fresh supply which is also full of food. Can you see those roots reaching in all directions? And can you see those tiny hairs on the roots? The water is taken in from the earth by those hairs and once inside the roots it flows up, up and up, as you see. Wonderful, isn't it?"

"Yes," said the boy thoughtfully. "No buts about it," said the Jogalong. "I know what you are thinking. You can't see any food in the water! Isn't that it?"

"Well, I can't," said the boy. "If there is food in it why can't I see it with these glasses?"

"Because," said the Jogalong, "it was all dissolved by the tiny hairs and thoroughly mixed with the moisture drops before it was allowed into the roots. What was good for the plant was taken in and what was not was very carefully left out. Wise creatures, plants! Never eat things that are not good for them. Look again, boy, now what do you see?"

Slowly and grandly, as a peacock unfurls its gorgeous tail, the boy watched a purple flower spread out its petals to dry in the sun.

"Isn't it beautiful," said the boy. "I've often seen flowers like that in my garden but they always seem to grow without anyone seeing them. I think that flower is an iris, isn't it?"

"Yes, it is, boy, and so delicate that if you touch its petals, you will bruise it."

Hello, there! Look at old Mr. Centipede. He's over on his back again. What happened next is in the next Jogalong tale.

Floor Coverings for the Bedroom

By BETSY CALLISTER

THE well-padded all-over carpet, preferably in a plain neutral tone, is, from one point of view, the ideal floor covering for the bedroom. It imparts an air of repose and quiet that is impossible in the room with rugs laid on a waxed or painted floor. But for practical purposes floors so covered are very nearly as undesirable as they were 20 or 30 years ago when they definitely went out of fashion. Vacuum cleaners do, of course, make them easier to sweep, but the task of taking carpets up at housecleaning time and the cost of having them relaid again is as great as it ever was.

If you want to make housekeeping as easy as possible never use a rug or carpet that extends under the bed. Fluff and dust are bound to drop from mattresses and bedding and this can be more easily swept up from a bare floor than from a carpet. Rather lightweight scatter rugs are the best for a bedroom and these should ideally be of a washable sort.

It is not at all difficult to wash a small oriental rug. Some housewives actually wash their small orientals in the laundry tubs, using moderately warm—not hot—water, and mild soap. Others wash them by laying them on a clean floor and carefully scrubbing with first with soapy water and then with clear water applied by means of a fresh brush.

Hooked rugs, so much admired at the present time, may also be washed without injury and almost all the inexpensive cotton rugs designed for bedrooms are of the washable sort.

Good Things the Family Will Like

By NELLIE MAXWELL

Forget each kindness that you do as soon as you have done it. Forget the praise that falls to you. The moment every kindness done to what's its measure. Remember praise by others won. And pass it on with pleasure."

A GOOD ox tail soup is a favorite dish with many. The following stew is worth adding to the card index:

Ox Tail Stew.

Wash the short lengths of ox tail and brown in its own fat. Cook two chopped onions in two tablespoons of butter, add to the meat with two and one-half quarts of water. Simmer until the meat is tender. A half hour before serving add four diced carrots, two sliced turnips and one large potato, two teaspoonsful of Worcestershire sauce, two teaspoonsful of sugar, salt and pepper to taste. When the vegetables are soft thicken the stew with flour and water mixed to a paste. Cool until well thickened.

Pilaf.

Fry one sliced onion in butter, using two tablespoons; when soft and yellow add two cupsful of boiling water, one cupful of uncooked rice, two cupsful of canned tomatoes, one cupful of round steak ground, two teaspoonsful of sugar, salt, pepper and grated cheese to suit the taste. Cook in a covered dish until the rice is soft. Cover with the grated cheese and brown in a hot oven.

Banana Junket.
Dissolve a junket tablet in a tablespoonful of water, add to a pint of warmed milk; flavor to suit the taste.

SUPERSTITIOUS SUE

HER BROTHER BILL HAS TOLD HER THAT—

If a poker player should hold "threes" three times in succession... he may as well quit for the night because that's a sign he will lose from then on.

Adolph Mats, assistant to Mrs. Helene Alberti, who is working on a means of self-propulsion through the air in experiments based on a Greek theory of cosmic motion, giving a demonstration with the aid of bat-like wings at Brookline, Mass.

SOME NEIGHBORLY SUGGESTIONS

WASH chamomile in tepid soapwater. Use one or two changes of suds until the chamomile is perfectly clean. Rinse in tepid water. Squeeze (do not wring) and hang in the sun. Snap it and pull it until it is perfectly dry.

It is easier to shorten a sleeve from the top than the bottom. This eliminates making a new pocket and taking off and putting on cuffs.

Do not waste cake or bread by cutting off a burned crust. This can be removed with a flat grater, and it will leave a smooth surface instead of a jagged crust.

Down One Day, Up the Next

By JEAN NEWTON

WHATEVER there may be of interest or helpfulness in what I am about to tell should bring credit not upon to me, but to a reader who is its real author. My part in it consists merely of transcribing what she told me.

A sweet-faced, white-haired little woman is Mrs. James Gray. You would have thought, as I did, particularly of her sweetness, if she happened to be telling you, as she told me, of a courageous fight which she and her husband have been waging against vicissitudes and adversity, with no more suggestion of complaint or discontent than is she relating any ordinary sequence of events.

Had it not been for her husband's long illness, which ate up about all they had been able to save and prevented his going back to what for so many years had been his work, there would be no story.

"Of course, he could not go back to that type of work," said Mrs. Gray, "and it is not easy for a middle-aged man to get an opportunity to start work at something new to him. So try as he might, he was without work for a long time."

"And then, just as we were about at the end of our rope, he had an idea. It was to start a lunch wagon up there on the hill. You see what made that particularly nice was that I could help him with the work. Well, he got the wagon and it 'went' wonderfully. I worked with him and we were very happy. That was for a while. Then it seemed other people got the idea and other lunch wagons, bigger, better equipped, newer ones, began coming in right close to us. That wasn't so good but we stuck and managed to get along. But last year the neighborhood changed. The gas works came in, and spoiled everything, and we had to give up the wagon.

"The worst of traffic tangles," says Flapper Fannie, "occur on lonely roads after the car is parked." (© 1931, Bell Syndicate.) (WNU Service.)

"So we are looking around again for something to do. But I don't feel badly about it. You see we have no children, only ourselves to look out for, and we'll always get along somehow."

And then Mrs. Gray gave me this little kernel of thought. "Whenever I feel myself getting the least bit discouraged," she said, "there is one thought that always helps me. You know how you will see for a long time a row of old, ramshackle buildings on a certain street, and then one day after you haven't been there for a while you suddenly find them gone and a row of beautiful, new tall buildings in their place? Well, that's the way we humans are—down one day and up the next. And if we're down today it only means we'll be up tomorrow!"

I think there is enough of benefit to all of us in that thought to warrant a vote of thanks to Mrs. Gray. (© 1931, Bell Syndicate.) (WNU Service.)

A Few Little Smiles

HER ONE WISH

A clergyman, calling upon a widow on some church matter and finding her distressed at her loneliness, offered a few words of consolation.

"You must not," he said, "be cast down by your sorrow and lonely position. Remember the maxim, 'Man proposes'—"

"Ah, sir," interrupted the widow, "if some man would."—Tit-Bits.

UNNATURAL FATHER

"Dubbins is an unnatural father." "How so?"

"His baby threw his gold watch from the third-story window to the pavement and he didn't see anything cute in it."

Universal Peril

On earth the reckless motors fly; The airplane is a rover Who even makes the birds on high Afraid they'll get run over.

Encouraging Confidence

"You seem to have forgotten all you used to know about baseball," said the girl who overhears.

"My escort is a little bashful," answered Miss Cayenne. "His superiority complex needs cultivating. I affected complete ignorance of the game so that he could have the pleasure of telling me all about it."—Washington Star.

Husband's Lookout

"I hear you are going to California with your husband, Mary," said Mrs. Jones to her maid, who was leaving to be married. "Aren't you nervous about the long voyage?"

"Well, m'm," was Mary's reply. "That's his lookout. I belong to him now, and if anything happens to me, it'll be his loss, not mine."

Could Be Worse

Mrs. Lewis—You say you can't stop the car! Good heavens! Lewis—It doesn't make any difference—there's no place to park, anyway.

In Style

He—Cupid is always represented as a poor little urchin without any garments. She—Yes; that is done so that he will never be out of fashion!

WANTED ATTENTION

"Did the mother of the bride cry at the wedding?"

"Yes, indeed. That was the only way she could attract attention to her new gown."

Bait

"Here's a pickle," said Cholly. "Just tell 'em your sister is out, that is all."

Want to His Head

"What! You want money? Why, I gave you five dollars yesterday."

"Yes, dear; but I bought a new hat with it."

"Good heavens! Does money always go to your head like that?"

Quiet

Judge—But, madam, how could you marry a man you knew to be a burglar?

Witness—Oh, he is so quiet about the house.

Got His Goat, Anyway

Caller—You report me as saying that I knew no more about the matter than I did about riding Greek goats.

Editor—Yes, sir. Wasn't that what you said?

Caller—Certainly not. I said "writing Greek odes."

Honors in Cosmetics

"Has your daughter done well at college?"

"Well, we think she's safe for honors in cosmetics."

Preserve Historic Telegraph Key

Washington.—A new national heirloom has been added to the White House collection.

It is the gold nugget and marble telegraph key which five Presidents have used to open celebrations, tunnels, canals, newspapers, fairs and bridges throughout the country.

The key was given to President William H. Taft, June 1, 1909, to open the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific exposition. Mounted on its five-inch marble slab were 22 nuggets of Alaskan gold taken from the Klondike August 16, 1896, when the precious metal was first discovered there.

The gold was offered for the key by George W. Carmack, discovered of the Klondike fields. Its original value was $500 but its historic value has been trebled and quadrupled by the ceremonies in which it has taken part.

The first ceremony was held in the East room nearly 22 years ago. Present were Mr. Taft and all the dignitaries of the cabinet and diplomatic corps. The key was mounted on a table, connected with a special wire to Seattle where the exposition was being held. Manipulating it was E. W. Smithers, White House telegrapher.

After Taft had pressed it, giving the signal for opening of the exposition, Smithers induced the President to let him be custodian of it. He has guarded it since. Recently it has been kept in the White House safe, as if it were a crown jewel. Smithers says he intends to leave it there to continue its historic career, although now it is his personal property.

In the entire key there is but one small point which is not gold. That is the contact point for transmission of the electrical impulse.

Among the famous occasions upon which the key has been used by Presidents are:

1913—Opening Gambo dike, Panama canal. 1915—The California exposition. 1927—The Holland tunnels under the Hudson river, New York and the Moffat water tunnel outside Denver, Colo. 1928—The Hawaiian fair, the impulse being transmitted across the ocean by wireless; the Cascade tunnel. 1930—The Hoover-Longview bridge, Washington.

SOFT PLACES

By THOMAS ARKLE CLARK
Dean of Men, University of Illinois

Wolf and Smid were talking together and plotting to marry Hypatia to the A. M. A. and Smid was hanging back, hesitating to take the dangerous step. "Well, well," he admitted finally in explanation of his momentary hesitation and weakness, "wise men are like moorlands—ride as far as you will on the sound ground, you are sure to come upon a soft place at last."

I have had little experience in riding over moorlands, but I remember the prairies. They looked as even as a floor, as smooth and safe almost as a macadam road, and covered with short grass they spread out as far as the eye could reach. Sixteen miles we could see to the southeast over an unbroken plain to where a single cottonwood stood. But there were soft, marshy places one found if he set out to ride far; there were gopher holes, and uneven dangerous spots where prairie wolves had burrowed into the ground or where groundhogs had slept during the winter. One had to be cautious and to remember that the apparently unbroken surface of the prairie had its uneven places where a horse might stumble and the rider's life be in danger.

But in spite of its spots the moorland is a very beautiful place; in spite of its gopher holes and its wolf dens the prairie has its fascinations; it was wonderful, impressive, romantic and satisfying.

It is not strange that when we examine the lives and characters of human beings we should find them like the moorland or the prairie—soft places, occasionally gopher holes, marshy spots, and it should not detract seriously from the strength and beauty of their lives to find that they were not perfect—nothing human is. Recent biographers have seemed to most delight in emphasizing the soft spots in the lives of the great men about whom they have written, rather than the beauty and the strength and the wide expanse of solid ground.

Living Creatures on Mars and Venus, Belief

Cambridge.—Contrary to belief of other eminent scientists Dr. Leon Campbell, Harvard astronomer, believes that there is life on other planets in our solar system. He thinks it ridiculous to believe that the earth is the only inhabited planet, and that at least two more, Mars and Venus, support living creatures.

Stole Detroit's Tax Receipts

One of the most daring robberies of recent years resulted in the capture of one thief and the escape of another with $3,000 in cash and $25,000 in checks which they had taken from a cashier's cage in the city hall of Detroit, Mich. Theodore Crowley, captured (right), told how he and an accomplice had cut the wire caging and taken the money, mostly tax receipts, from the cage during an unguarded moment, although police assigned to guard the city treasurer's office stood less than 50 feet away.

Prowling Owls Lured to Death

Chicago.—When the big horned owls and other feathered predators which prey on valuable game and song birds fly low through the Ogemaw forest of northern Michigan, they are apt to see several barnyard pigeons doing a swaying, intricate dance about 15 inches above the ground.

These dancing pigeons are not placed in the forest for entertainment, says the conservation department of the Isak Walton league. They are traps for the bloodthirsty predators, invented by Blaine Brannon, keeper of the Ogemaw refuge above Bay City, Mich.

Brannon took an ordinary barnyard pigeon and had it mounted with its wings spread. Then he fastened a slim coil of wire from the breast of the bird to a wooden base. The wire is just strong enough to support the mounted bird and a spring trap which rests on the back and wings of the bird. A chain from the trap leads to a stake in the ground.

When this outfit is placed in an open place in the woods or around a farmer's barnyard, the wind will cause the bird to sway and tremble. It will catch the eye of a large owl or bird killing hawk. The would-be killer swoops to seize the stuffed pigeon, thrusts his claws into the bird and open trap, and thus is caught.

The Glacial Period

The glacial period was that immediately preceding that of man. Ice covered 8,000,000 square miles of the earth's surface, sometimes a mile thick. The ice mass was over 2,000 miles long and half as wide, half of which was in North America. The Ohio and Missouri rivers mark its southern boundaries and all of Canada was included.

LIGHTS OF NEW YORK

By WALTER TRUMBULL

A zoological park is a great educational medium. There are many kids whose parents cannot afford to take them around the world, or even around the country, but they can go to the zoo and see strange animals from all parts of the earth. The other day Bugs Baer was walking through Central Park at dusk, an hour when many of the police have gone to supper. He heard a commotion in the direction of the buffalo pen, and paused to investigate. There were four or five small boys and a much annoyed buffalo.

"Get hot, Maggie," they would yell, and when one of them would sock her with a rock, Maggie got very hot indeed. If she could have broken out of that pen she would have made matters warm for the kids, but she could only glare and kick. Thus the youth of New York studies natural history.

I am told that the largest hand-tufted rug ever woven in a single piece is now being made by a firm in Czechoslovakia, which has furnished carpets to the White House and the royal courts of Europe, for the main lobby of the new Waldorf. The size of this adaptation of a Persian garden carpet will be 70 feet 2 inches by 49 feet 11 inches. I regret that they skimped that extra inch in width. They could just as well have made it an even 50 feet; but, at that, it will be a grand rug to drop ashes on. I don't see how a fellow with a cigarette could miss.

A girl became engaged to an aviator. He was starting a flight and she and the family went to see him off. The plane got away well and then the pilot circled around, flew above the heads of the family, rolled the ship and waggled the wings in salute. His fiancée began to cry.

"What's the matter?" they asked her. "Can't you see?" she replied indignantly. "The poor darling's senile."

Young people of today have plenty of courage. An art student on the Pacific coast married a girl of about his own age. Their assets consisted of a battered Ford and about $300. They drove the car East, where the girl had relatives. They decided that the boy's best chance lay in his studying art in Paris. He therefore took the bankroll and sailed for France, leaving the girl and the Ford with the relatives. She expects to get a job while the husband is away and feels sure that, on his return, they will be prosperous. How he is going to live over there and get back on that capital is a bit of a mystery, but neither of them appears to be worried about it.

A Brooklyn man recently stabbed his wife 16 times because she nagged him about coming home late and wouldn't let him go to sleep. The evidence would seem to indicate that she certainly got him wide awake.

COLLECTED FREE RIDE

Simon Fishman of Greeley county, Kansas, went west thirty-five years ago and planted several thousand acres of wheat in the middle of uncultivated plains. At the time he predicted to L. M. Baldwin, president of the Missouri Pacific railroad, that that railway would some day carry 1,000,000 bushels of wheat for export. Baldwin's reply was that when that happened Fishman could "get into my private car and go anywhere you wish on the system." Fishman has just been collecting the free ride, accompanied by his wife and daughter.

Greater Courage Won His Love

By JACK WOODFORD

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

IT WAS right in the middle of Main street that Cory Harden walked up to Joe White and Melissa. Anyone could see that he meant business. He wore the scowl that had been dreaded by many a town boy for years. . . . Dressed since grammar school days; because Cory could, unquestionably, fight. He was a natural born fighter. He loved to fight. . . . And so far as the records went he always won his fights.

Joe quailed inwardly. It was no secret, in town, that Cory wanted Melissa. . . . wanted her badly.

"Hello, Joe," Cory greeted. "Nice tie you're wearing this evening." He reached forward and flicked the tie, quick as lightning, out of Joe's vest. The boys hanging out down in front of the Silver Spoon restaurant snickered audibly. The constable, a lover of a good fight himself, discreetly withdrew into Barnum's feed store, where he could watch what might go on over the top of the desk in the front window, without having to assert himself as the law. Joe put his tie back into his vest. He tried to pass on. But Cory added:

"And that's a right cute straw hat, too, buddy." He knocked the hat off. It rolled a few feet away. Melissa was furious. . . . Spoke her mind as Joe went to retrieve the hat.

"You big bully," she said. "You're twenty-five years old now, and you act like a brat of ten."

"Yes, Melissa," he said earnestly. "I'm twenty-five, and I've worked hard. It's true I still like to fight now and then. I'm sorry. I promise you, though, that this will be my last fight, no matter how it turns out. I've worked hard. Dad's just made me a partner in the business, and I've saved up nearly five thousand dollars. Enough to buy a peach of a home for us. . . . Wouldn't have worked so hard though, Melissa, if I'd known you was going to take up with a fool soda clerk from out of town; when you and I have been sweethearts for years." Cory could say no more; for there was a crowd of young people surrounding them now, who might hear.

"Joe is at least a gentleman," Melissa retorted scornfully. Joe returned, at this juncture, dusting off his hat. He attempted to pass on with Melissa. That Cory could lick him he very well knew. Cory was stronger and larger. But when Cory now pushed him clear off the sidewalk, and took Melissa's arm, while the boys down the street laughed aloud jeeringly, something within him flamed to life. He sprang at Cory and struck him. Cory squared off, Melissa scolded and backed away. The boys came running up the street delightedly, yelling: "Fight! Fight! Fight!" The constable chuckled at his post over in the feed store.

Cory sailed in. Joe threw himself, a battering fury, at him, striking wildly. Cory backed away and threw up a better guard. Joe followed him, raining futile blows upon his guard.

Cory slashed at him with a strong right. Missed Joe by inches. Joe slashed back with a left, and connected with a heavy "smack" as his fist met Cory's face again.

Back and forth across the walk they danced and swung at each other. Time and again Cory missed his blows. Joe began to take heart. He settled down to apply something of intuitive boxing science. Instinctively he pretended to hit, without actually striking Cory off his guard, he whipped in blows that took heavy effect. Cory went down. Got up. Fought back desperately; went down again. . . . And then, suddenly, it was all over. Cory could not get up. He tried weakly to raise his arms. Failed! The boys surrounded Joe with new respect and awe. Like moths everywhere they viewed the disposing of their erstwhile hero, Cory, with derision and scorn. Their jeers rang in his ears. Joe was delighted. Too delighted to notice or care what Melissa was doing. His victory was such balm to a timid soul as he had never known. Melissa was kneeling at Cory's side.

"I always thought you were a coward," she whispered to Cory, "because you bullied other young men with your superior strength. . . . Don't think you're fooling me. I've seen you fight before. You thought if you got licked, my sympathy would bring me back to you. I do love you, Cory, and did, and now I always will, you're brave. You deliberately let him lick you in front of all your friends, and you did it for me. . . . that was braver, and more beautiful than winning a thousand fights. It's not sympathy for a loser I'm feeling; it's love for a winner."

The Sex War

The late Chellis Austin, head of Equitable, held the conservative view of his native Vermont, and post-war radicalism meant nothing to him.

Mr. Austin, at a dinner in New York one night, listened patiently to an argument on feminism and the sex war. It was the usual argument. Women excelled men in probity, but men made the better executives. Women was less often vicious, but when she was vicious she was more so than man.

So the argument went on, and finally Mr. Austin was appealed to. He laughed and said:

"The sexes should be paired, not compared."

WINONA ANNOUNCES CHAUTAUQUA PROGRAM

Winona Lake, Ind., June 22.—With the formal opening of the famous Winona Lake Chautauqua and summer season set for June 28, thousands of people have already arrived from all parts of the country. Practically all cottages have been opened and the numerous hotels are ready for the summer business.

Last summer the Winona management for the first time in its long existence, inaugurated a policy of open gates. Free admission to the grounds last summer brought the greatest crowd in Winona's history. The same plan will be in effect this summer. Charge will be made only for admission to entertainments.

James Heaton, Executive Manager, has announced a program of exceptional interest. The outstanding feature for the opening week will be the appearance of Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd on the evening of July 4. Admiral Byrd will conclude a notable patriotic program which is being arranged by the Winona management in conjunction with the American Legion.

Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, former famous British divine and now pastor of the Tabernacle Presbyterian Church at Philadelphia, Pa., will deliver sermons on the opening Sunday and is scheduled to give lectures during the first week. Other outstanding chautauqua features will help furnish entertainment during the week and throughout the six weeks of program preceding the annual Winona Bible Conference which opens August 14 and continues for ten days.

The Winona Band and Orchestra School, which operated here successfully last year, opened its second year's session on June 22 and will continue until August 6. An orchestra provided by this school, composed of outstanding young players, will furnish programs throughout the summer under the direction of Colston R. Tuttle, leader of the championship Marion, Ind., high school band.

During the second week the regular chautauqua program will be augmented by a special health program offered by the State Board of Health under the personal direction of Dr. Ada E. Schweitzer. This will be known as "Child Health Week," an annual event at Winona. In connection with this program will be held the Northern Indiana Conference on Child Health and Protection.

The annual Music Festival, August 10 to 13 will make Winona the mecca for music lovers. This will be staged in connection with the School of Sacred Music conducted by a splendid faculty headed by Homer Rhodeheaver, noted choir leader. During the Music Festival will be heard such artists as Salvi, world's greatest harpist and the Revelers, radio entertainers.

During the six weeks of chautauqua some of the best talent will appear. The list includes Seth Parker, radio entertainer; Mardoni, magician; Ramos Mexican Orchestra, Salisbury Players, Samuel Thaviu, violinist; Arcadia Novelty Company, Bergmann Players, Scottish Musical Comedy Company, Strickland Gillilan, Redpath Players, Cutler-Griffin Artists, Mason Jubilee Singers, Katherine Tift Jones, Pamahaska's Pets. Talking pictures will be presented at least once each week.

Foundation Day will be observed on August 9 and Rev. "Billy" Sunday, whose home is at Winona Lake, will speak in the forenoon and again in the afternoon in the great "Billy Sunday" Tabernacle, which seats 8000 persons.

Many meetings and conventions will be held at Winona during the summer months and boys and girls camps will entertain many thousands. ## AVOID TREE SHELTER IN TIME OF STORM

To seek shelter under an oak tree during a thunder storm is almost as dangerous as to search for gasoline with a lighted match. Of all trees, the oak is the most susceptible to lightning.

If you must get under a tree, find a beech, for it is rarely ever the victim of lightning. The ratio of the oak to the beech in being struck by an electrical bolt is 60 to 1, according to observations made over a period of years.

The roots of a tree tap the electrical field of the ground. When a storm cloud is overhead the positive electricity in it is attracted by the negative electricity in the earth, and lightning follows.

Trees, such as the oak, which have a large root area naturally have larger electrical fields than others. Oaks also have "tap" roots which go far into the ground and bring up large quantities of water to the trees, which serves as another attraction for electrical bolts.

The best advice is to avoid trees altogether when lightning is at work, as it would be somewhat difficult to make a scientific selection in time of emergency. Better to keep in the open spaces, if no house is near, and get thoroughly wet than to offer yourself as a target for lightning.

CHURCH WEDDING AT COBURN'S CORNERS

Guilford-Volkert

The wedding of Miss Freida Volkert, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Volkert, of Quincy, Mich., and Mr. Merl A. Scholes, of near St. Joe. The couple were attended by Mr. and Mrs. Howard Guilford, brother and sister-in-law of the groom.

The bride wore a rose beige chiffon dress with a yoke of lace. A hairband and lace hat and linen slippers completed her costume. Her flowers were Talisman roses and swansonia.

Mrs. Guilford wore a blue chiffon dress. She wore a white Panama hat and blond footwear. Her flowers were Columbia roses and blue delphinium arranged in a shoulder corsage.

The bride is a teacher in the Allen County Schools, having taught for the last three years in the Harlan School. The groom is employed as a carpenter by the B. & O. Railroad Company.

FRED GEE OF AUBURN ON BOOTLEG CHARGE

Suspected for some time by local officers of bootlegging, Fred Gee of Auburn was arrested and charged with possession. When the house was searched 48 pints of liquor were found in the pantry and some home-brew was confiscated in the basement.

Chief of Police Charles Davis, Sheriff John P. Hoff, his deputy, Herbert Grimm, and Night Policeman Henry West made the raid.

Arraigned before Judge William P. Endicott in circuit court Monday, Gee pleaded guilty and was fined $100 and costs and sentenced to the state farm for 35 days.

Gee admitted being in the liquor business, but said he started bootlegging in order to support his family. His wife and four young children were in court and presented a pathetic case.

Lesson for June 28

REVIEW: JESUS THE WORLD'S SAVIOR; SUFFERING AND SOVEREIGNTY

GOLDEN TEXT—For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus the Savior.

Since the lessons of the quarter center in one Supreme Person and have one transcendent theme, Jesus Christ the world's Savior, the best method of review for senior and adult classes will be to refresh the mind with the principal facts and leading teachings of each lesson. The following suggestions are offered:

Lesson for April 5.
Jesus taught humility to the disciples by the parable of how guests bidden to a wedding should seat themselves. The humble man will take the lowest place. Those who choose the lowest places in life have a chance of promotion.

Lesson for April 12.
The younger son, becoming tired of the restraints of home, demanded of the father the portion of goods which he would inherit. The father acceded to his request, and after his life of profligacy joyfully received him back into his home. This act portrays the forgiving mercy of God.

Lesson for April 19.
The story of the rich man and Lazarus gives us a look into two worlds. In this world the rich man lived in luxury while Lazarus begged at his door. In the other world their positions are reversed.

Lesson for April 26.
Prayer is an obligation on the part of the believer. It is essential to spiritual life. All true prayer is accompanied with becoming humility.

Lesson for May 3.
Zacchaeus brushed aside all difficulties in order to see Jesus. The soul which earnestly seeks Jesus shall never be disappointed. Zacchaeus proved the reality of his conversion by making restitution. He was saved instantly upon receiving Jesus Christ.

Lesson for May 10.
The Parable of the Pounds was spoken to correct the misapprehension of the disciples as to the immediate establishment of the kingdom. While the kingdom awaits establishment, it is incumbent upon the believer to use faithfully the gifts left in his hands by the Lord. While the size of the gift is a matter of sovereign choice on the part of the Lord, fidelity in its use is demanded. There is a time of reckoning coming.

Lesson for May 17.
Christ's entry into Jerusalem was his official offering of himself as the promised Messiah. His coming was in exact fulfillment of prophecy. Christ's driving out of the temple the money changers demonstrated his authority over the temple and its service.

Lesson for May 24.
Jesus knowing that the hour of his death was near, instructed the disciples to make preparation for the Passover, that he might have fellowship with them in this ordinance before his crucifixion. In connection with the Passover Feast, he instituted the Feast of the New Covenant. The bread was symbolic of his broken body. The cup was a symbol of his atoning blood shed on Calvary.

Lesson for May 31.
Jesus' indescribable agony in the garden shows us what it cost the sinless Son of God to identify himself with a sinning race. The load of sin was so revolting that the face of the loving Father was turned from his beloved Son.

Lesson for June 7.
The story of the crucifixion of Jesus presents the greatest tragedy of all history. The sinless Son of God suffering for a sinning race should move all sinners gladly to accept salvation at his hand.

Lesson for June 14.
The resurrection of Jesus Christ is one of the foundation truths of Christianity. It is the supreme proof that Christ was what he claimed to be and is the unmistakable evidence that his offering on Calvary's cross was accepted by God. The empty tomb is the supreme and great proof of the deity of the Son of God and of his victorious sacrifice.

Lesson for June 21.
Disputes and misunderstandings are bound to arise even among those who are members of Christ's body. Those who have been vitally united to him will be scrupulously careful lest they cause to stumble those for whom Christ died.

Never Fear
Never fear when the Lord bids you go down to the way "which is desert." The moment you set your foot in the wilderness you are the Lord's guest, and he ever keeps his table right royally furnished.—Guy Mark Pearce.

Interest in the Bible
What other book beside the Bible could be heard in public assemblies from year to year, with an attention that never tires, and an interest that never drows?—Robert Hall.

ARIZONA'S STORY

Ancient Mission of San Xavier del Bac, in Arizona.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)
ARIZONA, automobile traffic is settling predominantly east now, where it flowed west a few months ago. Much of it comes from California, but to a goodly number of the motorists who have been in quest of milder climates Arizona has been winter home, for it is fast becoming an American Egypt.

Since 1920, Arizona's tourist traffic has grown more than 1,000 per cent. Winter playground hunters are drawn to her ever-multiplying hotels, auto camps and dude ranches. In Phoenix on some winter nights 2,500 people sleep in the auto camps. At Flagstaff, among 51 motor cars parked about a hotel, licenses were counted from 22 different states and two from Canada. By train and auto, more than 200,000 people saw the Grand Canyon in one recent year.

Ten years ago a dozen tourists a day, coming from Tucson down to Nogales, were a crowd of sightseers. Last year close to 15,000 motorcar parties visited this bilingual town that sprawls astride the international border. Since the recent completion of the Southern Pacific railroad line down the Mexican west coast, one may ride from Los Angeles to Mexico City. This puts old Nogales, once but a camping place for Forty-niners, on one of the main railways tying up the two republics—a new channel of north and south tourist travel.

New Grand Canyon Bridge.

One of the highest bridges in the world has been completed recently across the Grand Canyon. One hundred thirty-five miles north of Flagstaff this dizzy structure spans the Colorado. It eliminates the old river crossing, known as Lees Ferry, six miles above its site. Until now the only vehicular way through the Canyon was down a narrow, dangerous mountain road that hugged the face of Arizona's scenic wonders, and especially of its warlike Apaches, had been brought back. But to most Americans practically nothing was known of Arizona; it was too hard of access. One early delegate to congress reached Washington by way of Panama and is said to have collected $7,000 in mileage! This same delegate, years later, set up a sun-worship cult in Arizona.

To give Arizona a seaport, Mr. Gadsden's own plan was to take in part of Sonora, down to Guaymas. This would have provided a port on the Gulf of California, which might have shifted the whole economic and immigration history of Arizona and probably of northwest Mexico, too. But this plan was not approved; Uncle Sam found himself with a remote, unexplored savage land, hard to reach. So, instead of our "American Egypt" having a seaport on its border, it remains a landlocked region of long rail hauls.

This inaccessibility, the character of the country itself, and its savage inhabitants kept Arizona for decades the most backward of all our territories.

Buying Arizona was folly, Eastern people said; its arid wastes were useless. Yet surveys began to show that for all its evil deserts, it had big rich spots of much value; also, now that it belonged to us, we were free to make roads across it, to tie up Texas with southern California.

Nearly Isolated for Years.

Yet for twenty years after the Gadsden purchase Arizona communicated with the outside world largely by water. Ships ran from San Francisco to the mouth of the Colorado river, via the Mexican ports of Mazatlan, La Paz, and Guaymas.

A semi-monthly mail and passenger stage line was started in 1857 from San Antonio to San Diego; but at times it cost the government $93 to carry each letter! A year later the historic Butterfield stages began running between St. Louis and San Francisco. An early writer says: "This was one of the grand achievements of the age, to span the continent by a semi-weekly line of stages, under bonds to perform, by sole power of oneself, a trip of nearly 2,500 miles within the schedule of 25 days."

It was the trek of people from the South to the West after the Civil war that began to give Arizona population. Previous to that, white men saw little of it, except the regions about Tucson, the Gila Bend, and Yuma, which lay along the Forty-niners' trails.

Today passengers on fast trains through Arizona complain if the show in the club car is not cool, or if the barber's razor is dull. Getting laid out for two hours at a pace like a tub with a broken engine is called hardship.

Arizona really began to grow up with the development of her mines by Americans.

Future Seems Assured.

Fears that when mines were worked out Arizona might decline in wealth and population have been allayed since the World war. There are two reasons: First, the increase of farm settlers under new irrigation projects; second, discovery of ways to mine and smelt copper at lower cost.

Where low-grade copper ore occurs in great masses near the top of the ground, as at Bisbee, miners simply blast and use steam shovels. More than 1,000,000 tons of rock have been broken by one "shot."

One can grasp the size of Arizona's mining industry when it is known that the state employs more than 25,000 men and digs each year 675,000,000 pounds of copper, 17,500,000 pounds of lead, 6,000,000 ounces of silver, and $5,000,000 in gold.

Inevitably, mining will decline; but by that day Arizona believes her increased farms, fruit, live stock, and other growing industries will preserve her economic balance.

Today there is the great Yuma project; the big new dams at Horse Mesa and Mormon Flat, and the new multiple-dome Coolidge dam on the Gila river, near San Carlos. The last named stands in a box canyon, eighty miles above the lands it waters. At present about 4,400 Pima Indian farmers, with 50,000 acres, are the chief beneficiaries. But, to make the project practical economically, it also waters an equal area owned by white farmers near Florence and Casa Grande.

THE STORY

With his English wife, Catherine, and son, Jeems, Henry Bulain, French settler in Canada in 1749, outlives a farm adjacent to the Tonawanda seigneurie. As the story opens the Bulains are returning from a visit to the Tonawanda. Catherine, wandering brother, Hepzibah, meets them with presents for the family.

CHAPTER II—Continued

Catherine took off her cape and hood and patted her hair more properly into place before a mirror hanging on the wall. Henri knew how fast her heart was tripping as he took her hands and held them for a moment and then, some day or night, he would disappear with all his belongings, and no one would see or hear him, or it might be six months, or a year, or, as in this instance, even longer before he returned, ready to promise and swear upon his soul all over again that he was sure to steal away in the end as before.

Each time that he came, he bore a huge pack on his shoulders, as if partly in penance, and the opening of this pack and the distributing of its contents had come to be the biggest event in Jeems' life, and also in his mother's in a slightly less degree. But Jeems had no trespassing thought of the never-falling bundle as he went back for his gun in the company of his beloved Uncle Hep. At the most providential of moments, his hero of all heroes was at his side, and securing this mighty personage's pledge of secrecy he lost no time in telling him about the boy he hated. At once the grip of Jeems' hand, and catching the telltale tremble in his voice, Hepzibah sat down upon the bag of ground corn and did not leave it until by shrewd questioning and sympathetic interest he had drawn from Jeems' heart a large part of what it had contained. At a second loud blowing of Henri's dinner horn they rose to their feet, and as Hepzibah shouldered the corn, his round red face was like a full moon of promise and cheer.

"It doesn't take a lot to win a fight, Jeems," he said, speaking in a confidential way. "Barring this Dutchman at Albany, I've never been rib-roasted by a big man yet, and I'm only tolerable sized, you observe. I've always had a reasonable preference for the big ones, come as come can, for they are slower to move and fall harder, and nine out of ten of them carry fat. This Paul Tache, now—I know by your telling of him that you can cob and comb him until he begs for mercy. It's all what you've got your mind made up to, Jeems—nothing more and nothing less. And you've got your mind made up to warm him, so go and do it, say."

Catherine came around the corner of the cabin to meet the plotters, and Hepzibah discreetly held back further words as he winked broadly at Jeems. It was the great night of two long years in the Bulain cabin, and Catherine's three Betty lamps and her Phoebe lamp and a dozen candles as well were lighted in honor of it, so that when darkness fell thick and starless about the wilderness, with masses of rain clouds gathering overhead, the home at the edge of Fort-tidden valley was bright with glow and cheer. The roast was cut open, and with attendant dishes of sukut-tahash, Johnny-cake, Apples, and carrots, and hasty pudding with maple syrup, gave opportunity for such feasting that an hour was well gone before Hepzibah Adams thrust back his end of the long table bench and brought forth his fat pack from under the stars which led up to Jeems' sleeping loft.

"Just a few little trinkets," he began, using the identical words he had employed one year after another. "A few whin-whams and baubles for the boy, a bit of trumpery for Sister, and a farthing worth of nothing in particular for you, Henri. Ah, here we have the first package, with writing on it in the hand of the scholar who sold me the goods—a cap, a ruff, a tucker, and a bolt of lace at five shillings a yard! Now who in this room can such allies be for—unless—" and at Catherine's delighted exclamation he tossed the bundle to her. But scarcely he had opened it, with her eyes intent upon her business, then Hepzibah unfurled a red silk petticoat in the candle glow, and this time Catherine sprang to her feet with an amazed intake of breath, for so well had Hepzibah arranged his surprise that one after another, he had a white low-hood, a black low-hood, and three more petticoats on the table—one of scarlet with black lace, one of colored druggie with pointed lace, and a third of black silk with ash-gray lining; and as Catherine stood gazing upon these treasures fit for a queen he added to them two pairs of stays for an eighteen-inch waist, and then showered over them such an array of lace drowins, garters, pincettes, and other neckerchiefs that Catherine closed her eyes for a moment and then opened them wide as if there might be a change of some clever trickery in it.

"Dear Mother in heaven!" she cried. "Are all of these ravishing things for me? They must have cost a fortune!" pausing to look at her smiling brother and at the same time holding up the scarlet petticoat with black lace.

"Two pounds fifteen shillings," said Hepzibah, opening his pack wider and working his hands quickly. "And to go with these dresses I have here ruffles and tuckers and threads and buttons and ribbons, and four pairs of the nicest shoes that ever came up the Hudson," and placing these last-named articles on the table with a flourish of arms, Hepzibah gave a gleaming chuckle and paused to fill his pipe.

Jeems' heart was near breaking with suspense, and it seemed to give an audible crack when his Uncle Hep's grizzled hands went into the pack again. He drew a bulky package from his store and passed it to Jeems' father. "Three of the finest pipes I ever laid my eyes on," he announced. "One made in Holland, one in London, and one in America, and five pounds of Virginia tobacco to go with them, Henri, along with a hat, a coat, and a pair of boots that may take you with honor to any avoirdree or gentry merry-making this side of the sea. Now, how's that?" And he stepped back as if his pack were entirely empty and held nothing at all for Jeems.

For an eternity, it seemed to Jeems, his uncle remained in this terrifying posture. Then, with deliberate and aggravating slowness, Hepzibah Adams returned to his pack.

No one of the three who were watching him would ever have guessed that Hepzibah's act was one weighted heavily with the force of destiny, nor that with dramatic inevitableness it was to change the course of human lives, bringing the high down to earth, and the earthly to great heights, looking passions and hatreds and loves, breeding tragedies and joys, and ending, at last, in what it is the purpose of this humble chronicle of human events to narrate.

A swift-coming thought, a deft return into the pack of a small bundle which he had intended for Catherine, and Hepzibah had changed a world. On such trivial happenings do the most powerful of the fates sometimes rest. Out of the farthest corner of the collapsing pack he brought this bundle to light once more and unwrapped it as he turned toward Jeems' big-eyed, anxious face.

"Jeems," he said, "I've put the notches in my memory right, you were born on the coldest January day I ever saw, and that makes you just twelve years and four months old this evening, which means that only three years, and eight months, lie between you and the day when you can be counted a man. According to law, you are a king's subject of maturity from that day and can take life and all its belongings into your own hands, so long as you are honest about it, and can stand up in equality before the stiffest privileged judge in the Colonies or New France. In other words, Jeems, I mean that in less than four short years you will be a full-fledged man!"

Having delivered himself of this introductory peroration Hepzibah finished unwrapping the package, and never had Catherine beheld such a handsome piece of velvet as this which her brother displayed in the candle glow. It was, par excellence, the finest of the treasures he had brought, a cloth of matchless beauty, a crimson glory so filled with changing humors and colors that it seemed to be alive in his hands. Surely this was another present for his mother, Jeems thought. But to his amazement and Catherine's surprise Hepzibah thrust the cloth into Jeems' hands.

"For Mademoiselle Marie Antoinette Tonawanda from a devoted admirer, Daniel James Bulain," he announced. "Jeems, don't blush. Twelve and ten are not far from sixteen and fourteen, when you will be man and woman, and if ever a seigneur's daughter finds herself lucky it will be on the day she marries a son of the tribe of Asenik. The writing on it, Jeems, tells where it came from and how much it cost; and along with it I have brought you some nankens for britches and clothes, four shirts, and a three-cornered hat with a black ribbon, six handkerchiefs, and a jackknife, two pairs of serge britches, as many of my shoes, and—this," and from the now completely emptied pack he drew forth a beautiful long-barreled pistol, his eyes aglow with a fighting man's pride as he fondled it in the light of the candles and pointed out its merits to Jeems.

"As long as you live, you must never part with this pistol, Jeems," he said. "It isn't new, you see, but its record is one of glory as long as my arm, and I'll tell you about it some day. It's a killer, lad, a killer deadly and sure, good for a hundred paces with less than an inch of drop," and he gave the weapon into Jeems' hands.

An instant of disapproval gathered in Catherine's eyes.

"It was kind of you to bring the cloth for Antoinette but I do not care for the pistol, Hepzibah," she said. "A pistol makes me think of—men fighting men. And here we are at peace, having need only of the rifle of Jeems' father, and an arrow to bring us meat. I feel it is not best!"

As she spoke thus confidently of peace, a cloud came over Hepzibah's face, but in a moment he had laughed it away and was telling her that within a week she would be as proud of her boy's marksmanship as she now seemed fearful of the pistol's influence upon his future.

The next day was the day of the auction sale at Lussan's place. Lussan was a wealthy farmer at the edge of the next seigneurie, ten miles away. He was returning to his old home near the Isle of Orleans, a country he liked better than the Richelieu, and was selling most of his goods. Among these were a plow with an iron point, a forty-gallon soap kettle, and a loom which Jeems' father wanted, so he had planned to start with the ox early in the morning. Jeems had heard Tontout say he intended to buy Lussan's three slaves, a mother and her daughter, and that the young wench was for Tontout. Tontout would be with her father. He would take his treasure package with him to Lussan's and find an opportunity to give it to her.

Should Paul Tache be there and see the overlord him again, or laugh in his mean suggestive way, speak anersing, or so much as say a word against his gift for Tontout. . . . A rumble of fresh-growing thunder was advancing out of the west, and preceding it came a roar of wind and a deluge of rain. Lightning cut once more in vivid flashes across the narrow path of the bedroom window, and the roof seemed to bend and groan under a sudden torrential bombardment. Jeems fought in unison with the elements. His spirit mounted savagely with the turmoil. He had his enemy down and was thrusting his head into wet and slimy mud. He was beating his face and eyes, and spilling his splendid raiment, and pulling out his hair. And Marie Antoinette was looking on. With the gorgeous red velvet in her hands and her eyes big and starry, she was watching him as he choked and kicked and pommelled the life out of Paul Tache!

The outbreak of thunder and wind and deluge, a whim of playful spring, passed as swiftly as it had come, and, in passing, it left Jeems breathing quickly and fiercely in his bed. He had risen in these moments to reckless heights, and his mind, hot with its desire for action, had settled with grim assurance upon what would happen the next day.

First he would present his gift to Tontout. Then he would do what his Uncle Hep had told him to do. He would whip Paul Tache.

Great Buddhist Temple Deserted and in Ruins

It is the Chandi Borobudur, at Djokjarta, the ancient temple ruin 22 miles up the hills west of Batavia. Its carved, gray, volcanic rocks tell the story of Gautama Siddhartha the Enlightened, or the Buddha, for whom the temple bells tinkle in Caylon and Burma and the bronze gongs clash in 10,000 lamaseries in Tibet, China and Mongolia, writes Allan H. Holcomb, in the New York Herald Tribune.

Vast in size, magnificent in architectural conception and unbelievable in its wealth of fantastic bas-reliefs, the Borobudur now stands desolate and solitary in the midst of one of the world's most teeming fertile plains. A bit of the ashes of the All Wise and Enlightened One rests under the mighty steps with only an occasional

Outdoor Living Room for Summer Is Provided by This Front Porch

By W. A. RADFORD

Mr. William A. Radford will answer questions and give advice FREE OF COST on all subjects pertaining to practical home building, for the readers of this paper. On account of his wide experience as editor, author and manufacturer, he is, without doubt, the highest authority on all these subjects. Address all inquiries to William A. Radford, No. 407 South Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill., and only inclose two-cent stamp for reply.

So many houses are being built these days without front porches that many will welcome a design offering a front porch with all the summer evening comforts that it suggests, an outdoor living room during the hot-weather period. Additional warm-weather comfort is suggested by the striped awnings which, protecting the windows from the direct rays of the sun, may be drawn up out of the way when cooler weather makes the warmth of the sun more welcome.

This is a substantial frame house, designed after the style of the Dutch Colonial and finished with the wide siding which has, of late years, won such well merited favor. It varies, in plan, from the Dutch Colonial in alloy. Window sash, splaydrels and trim will be of a rustless metal like aluminum or chrome-nickel steel.

Glass bricks made with heat-insulating air cells and light-diffusing surfaces, in translucent pastel shades of color, or faced and transparent, will form the walls. In the sunshine they will glitter like a frost picture in a silver frame. After nightfall, when the interior is lighted, they will become glowing towers of many-hued beauty.

"We are just beginning to study the effect of light and color on disposition, moods and general human efficiency," declares Albert E. Marshall, who has developed a hollow brick of glass that will withstand the heaviest loads and resist 1,000 degrees of heat without damage. "Structural glass walls will open a new field for the practical application of color science of living."

Poor Flooring Will Show Cracks in Short Time

Flooring of imperfect manufacture is likely to warp or develop cracks; it does not give the dependable service you expect from your floor and the very best workman cannot make its appearance all that is desired by the builder.

Home builders should be sure that the lumber they buy will require a minimum of carpenter work of planing, sawing and sorting.

One of the most popular floor boards is oak, which may be laid in an irregular manner with boards of alternate widths to give an antique effect. It displays nature's beauty in grain and construction, blending over the entire lustrous floor expanse.

Oak lends dignity to any room; it harmonizes with woodwork and with furniture of whatever period. It is the proper background for rugs. It is permanent. Time only improves its mellowness. It is easily kept in perfect condition; is cleanly and saves housework. The cost is negligible compared with temporary floor coverings.

Practical Builder Knows What Materials Are Best

The up-to-date builder knows from experience what construction materials wear the longest, look the best and satisfy the home owner most. Accordingly, he makes helpful and valuable suggestions. For the roof—a type of roofing which has proved good. For the trim—a kind he knows will please. And for wall paper because it adds life, color, beauty and is recommended as correct style by the country's leading decorators.

Singleness of Purpose in Revolution

The separation of the Thirteen United States of America from Great Britain had the slowest and inevitable of a natural growth. The fruit of independence did not drop from the parent branch until it had been matured by events and reached full ripeness. When the second Continental congress assembled on May 10, 1775—the skirmish at Lexington and Concord was but three weeks old and the siege of Boston by unorganized bands of New Englanders had begun.

The congress had been rebuffed by the British king, who had refused to receive its "Declaration of Rights and Grievances." That document had been drawn up as an ultimatum to the mother country. The king's reply had been indirect, but clear. He had begun military and naval preparations to put down "rebellion."

Despite this state of affairs few members of the congress, if any, desired separation. Benjamin Franklin later said that the first word he had heard in favor of independence was in March, 1776. John Jay afterward said that the first talk of separation he heard was in the fall of that year.

But however far separation was from their thoughts, the members of the congress had cast the die, and they staunchly adhered to its impress. They issued a "Declaration of the Causes and Necessity of Taking up Arms," in which they professed loyalty to the crown and justified the "resistance by force" of the Colonies. The declaration expressly stated that "we mean not to dissolve that union which has so long and so happily subsisted between us."

The declaration was dispatched, and pending a response, the congress took steps to make the Colonies' "resistance by force" effective. It took control over the army besieging Boston, appointed officers and called upon the state governments to raise arms and men. It appointed George Washington commander in chief of the armed forces.

Revolutionary Victories.
Civil and military events moved rapidly. Revolutionary organization took the reins of government from British officials, even in the royal colonies. The battle of Bunker Hill was fought. Later the British were forced to evacuate Boston, and New England was thus freed of hostile troops. Ethan Allen and Benedict Arnold led forces that captured the forts at Ticonderoga and Crown Point. Montreal was captured, but Quebec withstood attack, and the former place had to be abandoned. Attempts of southern Tories to break the power of the Revolutionists failed.

Meanwhile the king had replied to the congress' declaration. He denounced the Americans as rebels and forbade commercial relations with them. An act blockading the Colonial ports was passed by parliament. The congress retaliated by opening American ports to vessels of all nations, in disregard of the British navigation acts.

Step to Independence.
With affairs at this pitch, public opinion still did not favor a severance from Great Britain. The first official act that showed the turn of the tide came in May, 1776, when the congress suggested that each colony form a government based on the assumption that the crown's authority was no longer binding. The first move toward independence came in the same month, not from the congress, but from the provincial convention of Virginia, which instructed the Virginia congressional delegates to propose a resolution of independence. This was done on June 7 by Richard Henry Lee.

The delegates as a whole, however, were not yet prepared for so decisive a step. The vote on the resolution was postponed, but the proponents of the measure managed to obtain the appointment of a committee to draw up a declaration. While the committee was engaged in the work of drafting, the proponents whipped up support for the resolution. On July 1 it received the votes of nine state delegations, and on a later date the vote was unanimous.

Colonies United.
The Declaration of Independence was born on July 4, when the report of the committee—composed of Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, Roger Sherman and Robert R. Livingston—was unanimously adopted. It was born one year and three months after the fighting at Lexington and Concord ushered in armed hostility between the Colonies and the mother country.

Subsequent events proved how beneficial to the new nation this slow birth was. The happenings of the fifteen months had taught the Colonies to work in unison, and had given them a common outlook. They showed their strength and singleness of purpose in their successful prosecution of the war, and that ended, in the strong government they created. True, that government in its early days often had trouble maintaining its authority, but it was never seriously endangered until the occasion of the Civil war. The outcome of that struggle settled for all time the question of the oneness of the American Union.

Nation's Firm Foundation.
Rarely does history show a parallel case of a nation, springing from a revolution, proving as stable as the United States has been during the 155 years of its existence. There can be no gainsaying that this stability has proceeded largely from the circumstances of the nation's birth. There was no abrupt break with the past, as has been the case with many European and Latin American and South American republics. The American Revolution evolved naturally from the American people's political maturity and strength. And the evolution of American institutions, for the good of us all, must proceed in the future as in the past—slowly, and upon firm ground.

Trusted the People
The safety of the nation requires that the greatest amount of power must be left in the hands of the people.—Thomas Jefferson.

Briefly Told
One achievement leads to another accomplishment, one failure results in another half-truth. So it is imperative to stick to the thing one is trying to do until it is done.

Mr. and Mrs. Carl Johnson and children, Mr. and Mrs. Glen Washler and baby, Mrs. Cora Maxwell and son, Willard, were Sunday dinner guests of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Bishop and daughters. Afternoon guests were Roy Washler and family and Ross Bishop and family.

Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Buckingham were in Cleveland last week during the storm and report the city being torn up considerably. Over the city and in parks, 10,000 trees were blown down, 10 persons lost their lives, stores, fronts were blown in for blocks, autos were stranded in the rain and the streets became veritable rivers, water was sucked out of the lake and dumped into the streets, and people were compelled to swim out of their autos to safety. They came home Saturday. They were accompanied by J. E. Foltz and visited their brother, M. E. Foltz and family while in the city.

The petition of Blanch Trotter to partition real estate has been granted in the DeKalb circuit court and the Auburn Station bank was appointed commissioner to make the sale and distribute the proceeds. The court found that Blanch Trotter, Barbara Houser, Dave Thompson, Mary Thompson and Catherine Houser each owns a 1-12 interest in the property, Margaret Vasmus and Blanch Starnd each a 1-24 interest and Pluma E. Houser a half interest. The real estate question is the 20 acres sold some time ago by Mrs. Pluma Houser and bought by Mr. Walter of south of Spencerville. Wm. Curie has been selected as one of the appraisers.

THE FOURTH OF JULY
To the ages who spoke, to the heroes who bled,
To the day and the deed, strike the harp-strings of glory!
Let the song of the ransomed remember the dead,
And the tongue of the eloquent hallow the story!
O'er the bones of the bold Be the story long told,
And on fame's golden tablets their triumphs enrolled,
Who on freedom's green hills freedom's banner unfurled,
And the beacon-fire raised that gave light to the world!

They are gone—mighty men!—and they sleep in their fame! Shall we ever forget them? Oh, never, no, never!

Let our sons learn from us to embalm each great name,
And the anthem send down—
"Independence forever!"
Wake, wake, heart and tongue! Keep the theme ever young; Let their deeds through the long line of ages be sung
Who on freedom's green hills freedom's banner unfurled,
And the beacon-fire raised that gave light to the world!

Apostle of Liberty

JEFFERSON, PATRIOT AND STATESMAN

The nation celebrates the birthday of the god who holds the torch that lights freedom's way. Her flame still burns. Though wars have dimmed its rays and sorrows shaken her uplifted arm, and veiled the land in shadow from her sight, her hope lives on. May her pure light yet shine through all the earth!

Tomb of Thomas Jefferson, Third President of the United States. He Was Born April 13, 1743, and Died July 4, 1826, the Same Day as John Adams, His Presidential Predecessor.

Jefferson and Time's Change

Thomas Jefferson was distinguished among his contemporaries for an uncanny capacity to plumb the future. Times without number the foresight of Jefferson enabled him to predict the course of history. And yet, it is doubtful if even his prophetic vision could have enabled him to imagine the present-day offspring of the national government in the creation of which he played so large a part.

A sturdy individualism was the ideal of Jefferson. His beliefs and those of his party were the doctrines of agriculturists, and particularists, devoted to their own localities, their own states and their individual rights and liberties. The power of the state in any form was a thing of evil and to be resisted. "That country is governed best which is governed least" aptly summarized their code. Out of such sentiments there emerged the foundations of the national character. Men felt that "the law swept around each citizen a wide circle of individual rights into which no government, state or federal, could intrude except at its peril."

Fear of Centralization.
Such was the political faith of a country run in its habits and thought. Jefferson mistrusted large centers of population and esteemed a society composed of planters, farmers and small traders, as the bulwark of republican government.

Jefferson may have foreseen that the Colonies could not forever remain essentially agricultural in industry or society. But it is doubtful if he or the others who labored with him imagined that industry would ever so largely predominate the interests of the United States.

To cope with this condition the functions of the state have been multiplied and rights and liberties of the individual citizen have been successively narrowed to conform to a new condition of society. These changes, the incidence of which has been confined largely to the years after the Civil war, have so altered American government as to make it hardly recognizable as the same fabric that was once frequently and plainly marked by Jeffersonian individualism and opposition to centralized authority.

The difficulties of unemployment and depression, multiplied in our large centers of population and peculiar to an industrialized community, confirm Jefferson's apprehensions as to the evils of urban society. But, however the transformation from a rural to an industrial state may be deplored, its problems are not to be solved by regretting their existence. The change has been inevitable and the colonies of the Atlantic coast with their thirteen million people could not have been expanded into a nation stretching across the continent and populated by one hundred and twenty millions without abandoning the social structure of an agricultural community.

Philosophy Justified.
And tremendous as the revolution has been it by no means has outlawed the political philosophy of the Sage of Monticello. There is need today as there was in 1776 for men who esteem the sovereignty of the people; freedom of thought and speech; local self rule; and economy in government. And if time has altered the social structure he believed in, it has confirmed his passion for human liberty, his faith in democratic principles, his program of national expansion and has proved him not only one of the world's greatest political philosophers but one of America's most practical and successful statesmen.

It is seldom in the history of men or nations that the same lofty idealism is combined with the sound realism he brought to bear in the consideration of government affairs. When modern statesmanship focuses upon economic problems the intellect and ideas that Jefferson directed to the solution of political difficulties, the "rights of men" will acquire a new meaning and industrial society achieve a form more hospitable to human happiness and progress than it has in the past.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Monmouth

Record of Victory That Inspired Patriots of the Revolution.

Monmouth county in New Jersey celebrated in 1928 the 150th anniversary of the Battle of Monmouth. This day of the Revolution was re-enacted in a pageant which showed how the fight was waged from Monmouth Courthouse to Old Tenny, and also the heroic part played that day by Molly Pitcher, writes May W. Mount in the New York Times.

The victory of Monmouth strengthened the morale of the army, worn by their winter at Valley Forge, and encouraged the Colonies in their struggle. It made their commander in chief more heroic than ever as they pictured him, constantly exposed to fire, rallying his troops.

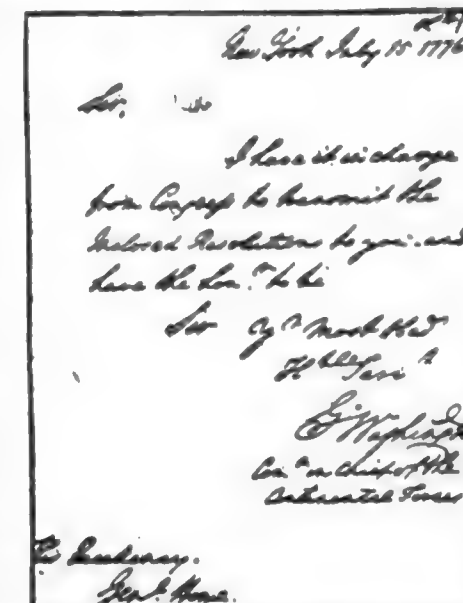

In dead, wounded and missing the British lost 932 and the Americans 300. Included among these were four British and eight American officers; fifty-nine British and many Americans died of fatigue and exposure. The banks of Molly Pitcher's brook were strewn with dead and wounded soldiers who had dragged themselves to the water.

The British dead and not a few of the Americans were buried on the field.

At some period after the War of the Revolution the village of Monmouth Courthouse changed its name to Freehold. But the old Scotch settlement, whose first church was the Scotch meeting house at Topanemus (now in the borders of Freehold), centered about the courthouse, and all roads led to its tree-shaded square.

Historic Data

Priceless Collection of Documents Brought to America.

Facsimile Letter of George Washington Brought to New York From British War Archives.

One of the most important collections of Washingtoniana, including the headquarters documents of the British army in America during the War of Independence, bound in 62 volumes, has been acquired by Dr. A. S. W. Rosenbach, well-known Philadelphia book collector.

The manuscripts number about 20,000 and were collected by Sir Guy Carleton, afterward Lord Dorchester, who was commander in chief of the British army in America from 1782 to 1788.

The collection includes 60 letters of George Washington addressed to Sir Henry Clinton and Sir William Howe, most of which have not been published. There is also the correspondence of Sir William Howe, Lord Barrington, Lord North, Lord George Germaine, Earl Shelburne, General Burgoyne, Maj. John Andre, William Franklin (son of Benjamin Franklin), Lord Cornwallis, Lord Amherst and Sir James Wright.

"The collection of American manuscripts," Doctor Rosenbach stated, "is by far the finest ever brought to this country. On account of its great historical value as a whole, it will always be kept together."

"The letters of the American loyalists, or those who took sides with Great Britain, comprise the finest collection known. The papers relating to the capture and evacuation of New York constitute the largest extant mass of material on the subject."

Henry Knox

Commanded Colonial Guns Which Made Possible Great Victories.

Henry Knox, Boston book seller, was the father of American artillery. He was colonel of the First artillery regiment. He procured the guns. They were mounted on Dorchester heights and drove the British out of Boston by the threat of their position. He was in command of the artillery throughout the Revolution to the artillery climax of reducing the works of Cornwallis at Yorktown to ruins and the general to surrender.

He was born in Boston in 1750. When he came to adult years he opened a book store. With the selling of books he combined an interest in soldiering, and held a commission in a military company.

The celebrated tea party and its sequel made temporary departure from Boston a matter of wise tactics, and he left with his wife, taking his sword along concealed in the voluminous folds of her dress. Presently he turned up as a master of fortifications and artillery. His skill in preparing defenses and the placement of guns attracted the attention of George Washington, who gave him command of the artillery in the Revolutionary army.

After the capture of Yorktown he was made a major general, and served as the first secretary of war and navy from 1785 to 1796. He died in 1806. Knox college, at Galesburg, is named after this American hero, a fact not so widely known as it should be. Frequently Knox graduates bear the name of John Knox, the Scottish religious reformer and saint of Presbyterianism, referred to as that of their patron. Henry Knox, it is said, was his lineal descendant.

Chocolate Sundaes Liked by All

Chocolate Sundaes Made at Home.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

Chocolate sundae is one of the most popular of all soda fountain dishes. There is no reason why anyone who cares to go to the trouble of making ice cream once in a while should not frequently enjoy this excellent combination of chocolate sauce and ice cream right at home. Either vanilla or chocolate ice cream may be used, but vanilla seems to be generally liked.

Almost everyone has a favorite recipe for vanilla ice cream, but in case yours is not at hand, here are two different ones from the bureau of home economics, United States Department of Agriculture. The first is for French vanilla ice cream, made with double cream and egg white and frozen without stirring in a mechanical refrigerator or by packing in the usual way in ice and salt. The plain mousses are very rich, especially when chocolate sauce is added to it. Small portions will be sufficient. Be sure to keep the chocolate sauce hot in the double boiler when this dessert is served. Sponge cake, sunshine cake, lady fingers or angel food would be a good choice to accompany the chocolate sundae, rather than a layer cake with icing.

French Vanilla Ice Cream.

1 quart milk 1/2 cup sugar
1/2 pint double cream 1/4 tsp. salt
4 eggs 1 1/2 tsp. vanilla

Heat the milk, sugar, and salt in a double boiler. Beat the eggs slightly and mix in some of the hot milk. Pour back into the double boiler and stir constantly until the custard coats the spoon. Cool, add the cream and vanilla, mix well, and freeze. For the freezing mixture use one part of salt to six parts of ice and turn the crank slowly during freezing. Remove the dasher, pack with more ice and salt and let the cream stand an hour or more to ripen.

Plain Vanilla Mousse.

1 cup double cream 6 tbs. sugar
1 cup rich milk or 1 egg whites thin cream 1/4 tsp. salt
1 tsp. gelatin 1/2 tsp. vanilla

Soak the gelatin until soft in a little of the milk or this cream. Heat the remainder and pour over the gelatin. Add the sugar and stir until dissolved.

Mythological Character.

Cassandra in mythology was the daughter of Priam and Hecuba. She was beloved by Apollo. Cassandra promised to listen to his addresses, provided he would grant her knowledge of the future. This she obtained, but she was regardless of her promise. Apollo in revenge determined that no credence should be given to her prophecies.

Favored for Tots' Party Frocks

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

A very important member of fashion's clientele is the little girl who goes to one party after another. In this fortunate class, designers of juvenile styles take a special interest, for, of course, tots who are "in society" must have many, many pretty frocks to wear.

To setting mothers who look to question the oracles of fashion that be, in behalf of their wee daughters as to "what to wear" to the next party, comes the answer from Paris and other style centers that georgette and other sheer weaves of like character are at present disputing the supremacy of taffeta which has been and still is very popular for little girls' party frocks.

One point on which all designers of children's apparel agree is that there is no limit to the amount of decorative handwork which will be lavished on summer clothes for the younger generation. The material itself may be very inexpensive, such as, for instance, the dainty pale green georgette of bemberg which fashions the cunning gown pictured, but the fact of it being handmade and exquisitely embroidered gives it an enviable air of distinction.

An effective touch is added to this dainty dress in that it is trimmed with net in matching light green, the same cleverly worked in insets which serve as a background for clusters of wee pink rosebuds which are hand embroidered.

This matter of trimming the dainty bemberg robes and georgettes which come in fascinating monochrome pastels with matching net is well worth copying. The combination achieves that extreme sheerness which is so much to be desired this season, since the mode is making a feature of airy light effects.

Lots of net footing, too, is being frilled on little folks' dresses. It is really a very practical trimming as it not only wears well but retains its pulled gently into perfect shape.

All Around the House

Small rugs scattered over a floor are hard on the flying feet of the preschool child.

Woolen or worsted garments are less likely to shrink if they are not dried in strong heat.

A little sweet pickle relish added to mayonnaise dressing makes a pleasant variation in its flavor.

A thin coat of lacquer helps to keep brass fixtures from tarnishing and nickel finishes from wearing off.

Baking a custard by covering it, setting it in a pan of water, and cooking it on top of the stove gives it a velvety texture.

If the air in the house is dry, colds and other respiratory troubles tend to increase. Moisture and circulation of air as well as heat are necessary for a comfortable, healthful atmosphere.

Before punishing a child the adult should decide whether the behavior was objectionable with reference to the child's ultimate good or only from the standpoint of his own personal and immediate comfort.

GEESE WAYS

"Good morning, Mrs. Goose," cackled Mrs. Duck. "How are you today?" "I'd be better," said Mrs. Goose, in a shrill voice, "if you left me alone."

"I'm sure you don't mean that," said Mrs. Duck. "Your feelings are hurt because none of us have paid you any attention."

"Yes, you've grown bitter," "Nonsense," said Mrs. Goose, "I love the quiet."

"You can't say so," said Mrs. Duck pleasantly, "because I feel sure that it isn't true."

"It's quite true," said Mrs. Goose, snapping crossly. "I love to be left alone."

"It's not only a pig I don't like. I don't care about any outsiders. Geese are good enough for me."

"I think," said Mrs. Duck, "that you have been alone so long that you don't know how to be to friends."

"I'll be your friend, and we'll be so happy calling on each other."

"I don't want you for a friend," said Mrs. Goose. "I have Mr. Gander and the little Goshings. They are such precious children."

"I'm glad you like some creatures," said Mrs. Duck. She was losing patience. She had tried so hard to be friendly with Mrs. Goose, and Mrs. Goose was simply a cross old thing.

"I like creatures worthy to be liked," said Mrs. Goose, sticking out her hind toe, which is her great pride.

"How are you any better than any of us?" asked Mrs. Duck.

"We are perfect," said Mrs. Goose.

"I don't think so," said Mrs. Duck.

"That's because you don't know any better," said Mrs. Goose. "In the first place we have shorter necks than the swans."

"The swans are beautiful," said Mrs. Duck. "You can't pretend that you something about which to be conceded."

"People often say 'as stupid as a goose,'" said Mrs. Duck, "and now I know the reason why."

"Poor Ducky," said Mrs. Goose, "you care so much about what is nice and what isn't and what is pleasant and what isn't."

"I think you are so foolish."

"Well, good-day," said Mrs. Duck. She had found it was quite useless to try to be friendly with Mrs. Goose.

She had tried it before and it hadn't worked out, and she had tried it now, and it still hadn't worked.

Mrs. Goose just didn't want to bother with Mrs. Duck, so Mrs. Duck left.

think it fine to have shorter necks, I hope.

ceded."

Fresh Cherries Will Make Welcome Desserts

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

The cherry season is relatively short, and while it lasts it is a good plan to treat the family to fresh cherries as often as possible. The tart red cherries make excellent pies and puddings. There are several little "tricks of the trade" in making any pie from juicy fruits, in order to keep the undercrust from being soggy and the juice from running out. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture explains what they are:

Fresh Cherry Pie.

4 cups tart juicy 2 tbs. butter pitted cherries 1/4 tsp. salt
2 tbs. cornstarch Pastry
1 cup sugar

Simmer the cherries for five minutes and drain. When the juice has cooled, mix the cornstarch with it, cook until thickened, and add the cherries, sugar, butter and salt, and mix well.

Line a deep pie tin with pastry and bake until the crust is a golden brown. Pour in the hot fruit mixture, moisten the rim of the crust, and place the uncooked crust over the fruit. Turn the dough over the cooked crust tightly so the juice will not escape during cooking. Bake in a moderately hot oven (375 degrees F. to 400 degrees F.) for 25 to 30 minutes or until golden brown.

cooked spaghetti on the platter. Pour one-half cupful of melted butter over it and sprinkle with more grated cheese. Parmesan or roman cheese is preferred. Add pepper or paprika to season. If more sauce is desired add a little hot water to the butter, using one-third of a cupful of boiling water.

Caviar mayonnaise has one-half tablespoonful of caviar, one tablespoonful of horseradish, to one-half cupful of olive oil mayonnaise. Serve on tomatoes.

TWO-GARMENT SUITS FOR LITTLE FELLOWS

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

A sun-suit ensemble for a boy consists of just two garments—trousers buttoned to an open-mesh top, and an overblouse. The sun suit itself is worn without undergarments, for play in the sunshine. Then when it is time for the child to go on the street or indoors, the matching blouse is slipped button to a straight net waist cut away around the neck and under the arms as much as possible. The part passing over the shoulders, however, is fairly wide, to prevent cutting into the child's flesh, and fitted comfortably so the garment will not slip. The waist buttons are just the right size and in the right places for very small and inexperienced fingers to reach easily.

TALES... of the TRIBES

By EDITHA L. WATSON

The Iroquois

The first successful League of Nations was that of the Iroquois, also known as the Five Nations. These tribes, the Seneca, Mohawk, Cayuga, Oneida and Onondaga, were united in a confederation by the efforts of Dekanawida, a Iroquois.

Tuscarora were admitted to the league, which was known from then on as the Six Nations.

All the Iroquois tribes were much alike in their customs. Kinship was traced exclusively through the female blood, and the women controlled many of the political and legal situations. The lodges and their furnishings were the property of the women, and so were the children. All lands, including the burial grounds, also were theirs. Since women were the owners of so much of the tribal property, it followed that the councils, even that of the league itself, while composed of men, really only represented the women and their rights.

The penalty for killing a woman was twice that for killing a man. Women possessed the right to forbid their sons to go on the warpath; they kept close watch on the affairs of their tribe, and guarded the treasury, with a voice in the disposal of its contents. The feminists of today may point with pride to this great confederation as the prototype of their desired civilization.

In each tribe certain classes of persons held the position of chiefs, and there were three grades of these, whose functions were defined by the tribal laws. The confederation was an enlargement of the tribal government, which created new rights and duties, yet adhered closely to the precedent set by the separate tribes.

The sensible laws and principles of the constitution of this confederation were due, in a large measure, to Dekanawida, a Huron, who appears to have been a man far in advance of his time. Hawanah, a Mohawk, was the one who undertook the enormous labor of putting Dekanawida's principles into practice. The story of these two men almost passes belief, because of the time in which they lived, the obstacles they were compelled to surmount and the brilliance of their final achievement for the Iroquois confederation will stand forever as a wonderful example of aboriginal government.

When the Europeans first heard of the league it was already a powerful one, and as soon as contact with the whites enabled them to obtain firearms, the Five Nations began to conquer their neighbors on all sides and to extend their territory. They were successful in this expansion until blocked by the Cherokee on the south, and the Chippewa (who were also expanding) on the west. In fact, the Chippewa finally forced them to withdraw from part of the country they had conquered, the peninsula between Lake Erie and Lake Huron.

The Canadian Indians to their north were resisting their advance also, and when Champlain joined them and held the league tribes back, he created in the baffled Iroquois most bitter enemies of the French. From this time on the French had cause to know the strength and the venom of these Indians, who, as they had become allied with the English, had powerful backing.

The French, realizing not only that these were dangerous enemies but also that they would be friends worth having, tried every means in their power to change their attitude. The missionaries were charged to befriend these Indians and to try to alter their enmity, and were successful in some individual cases. A good many from the Mohawk and Onondaga and a few from the other tribes, withdrew from their people and formed settlements of their own on the St. Lawrence river. These people, known as the Catholic Iroquois, were friendly to the French, and took part with them against their former tribesmen. The league tried, time after time, to win them back, but finally gave them up as traitors who would not reform.

When the American Revolution began it was decided among the Iroquois to let each tribe make its own choice of action. The league had always been friendly with the English, so that they all, with two exceptions, joined their friends in the struggle. The Oneida (the most cruel and least tractable of the Iroquois tribes) and part of the Tuscarora remained neutral.

After the war those of the league who had been allied with the English were settled on a reservation in Ontario. Those in the United States, except the Oneida, were given reservations in New York, while the Oneida went to Green Bay, Wis., near which place they settled.

VOICE FROM THE SKY

Hark to the voice from the depths of the sky! There's a message to heed in that clarion cry.

THE Red Terror which had swept over the Old Pasture had become a thing of the past. The little people of the Green Meadows and the Green Forest had gone back to their usual life. That is, most of them had. Old Jed Thumper, the gray old rabbit who had always lived in the Old Pasture, had decided to make his home in a bramble-tangle on the edge of the Green Forest. You see, he couldn't go back to his old home because his bramble castle in the Old Pasture had been burned by the fire. Worse still, there was nothing to eat there now. In fact, the Old Pasture was just a black and dreary waste.

Only Old Man Coyote had gone back there to live. He had a den hidden among the rocks there, and of course, the fly couldn't burn the rocks. So Old Man Coyote still lived in his den in the Old Pasture. Of course he couldn't hunt there because there was no one to hunt, but then he did most of his hunting on the Green Meadows and in the Green Forest anyway, so he didn't mind that.

By this time most of the feathered folk who spend the winter in the sunny southland had left on their long journey. Johnny Chuck had grown almost too fat to waddle, and his neighbors expected to learn any day that he had gone to sleep for the winter. Paddy the Beaver and Jerry Muskrat were very busy putting the finishing touches on their houses and laying up supplies. Happy Jack Squirrel, Chatterbox the Red Squirrel, and Striped Chipmunk were scurrying about as if they would run their legs off. They were storing away fat acorns and plump hickory nuts and brown chestnuts and corn. Danny and Nanny Meadow Mouse were hiding away stores of seeds in secret places on the Green Meadows, and their pretty cousin, Whitefoot the Wood Mouse, was doing the same thing in the Green Forest. You see, they all knew that almost any day now Jack Frost and Rough Brother North Wind were likely to come to stay, and they meant to be ready.

It seemed to Peter Rabbit that his neighbors, some of them anyway, made a terrible fuss about the coming of winter. Peter didn't worry about cold weather. Not he. So long as he had a new warm coat he cared not how soon Jack Frost arrived. As for the coat, he had it already. Old Mother Nature always looks out for him in the matter of a new coat. So Peter watched the others work, and in his heart he was glad that he didn't have to. You see, Peter never has learned how blessed it is to work. He is happy-go-lucky and lazy. When he was not watching the others work, Peter was busy listening. It is surprising how busy some people can keep just listening. It is that way with Peter. That is one reason he has such long ears.

But this time Peter wasn't listening to things that were none of his business. He was listening for a certain sound. He was listening for the voice of the messenger whom Jack Frost and Rough Brother North Wind always send ahead of them when they are coming down from the frozen Northland to stay for the winter. Peter never really believed that they had started until he heard the voice of that messenger. It was unusually late this year. He had almost begun to think that Jack Frost and Rough Brother North Wind were not coming at all. Then late one afternoon down from the very depths of the sky, there floated the sound Peter had listened for so long.

"Honk, honk, K'honk, honk, K'honk, honk!"

Peter looked up in the blue sky, and there he saw Honker the Goose at the head of his flock. So high they were that they seemed more specks, but clear, and carrying with it a strange thrill, came Honker's voice out of the sky. He was the messenger for whom Peter had been listening, and Peter knew then that Jack Frost and Rough Brother North Wind were not far behind.

"ALL TALK AND NO CIDER"

FEW illegal quips are more typically American than this combination of words which can very well be interpreted to mean "a great deal of fuss with very little result." Fairly synonymous with it is the phrase "Much cry and little wool"—in both instances the idea conveyed being the same.

This Americanism is said to have been inspired in Buck's county, Pennsylvania.

It seems that certain politicians invited all the citizens of the county to a so-called "cider party."

To the great disappointment and resentment of the population, the gathering was entertained by long-winded speeches and mutual eulogizing among the speakers while the serving of refreshments was dispensed with.

It was one of those present, who feeling that he had been brought to the meeting under false pretenses, coined the phrase "All talk and no cider."

THE GIVING OF KNIVES

THE popular superstition that it "breaks friendship" to give or accept a knife without something of value—preferably money—passing in return is a survival from the primitive man.

The savage having progressed from a club to a knife or spear as a weapon soon learned the danger of relinquishing it merely for friendship's sake. His friend, having disarmed him, was apt to be his friend no longer. So, for giving up his knife, even to his friend, he demanded a quid pro quo. And he saw that when a friend presented him with a weapon, that friend presently came to regard him—because of regret for the act or because of envy at the added superiority the gift bestowed—with suspicion growing into enmity. Whereas if he gave a consideration for the knife, it was a matter of fair trade and friendship was likely to endure.

All this became so deeply ingrained in the mind of the primitive man that the idea survives today as a popular superstition. Popular superstitions belong to folk lore, and where they have not a religious derivation are mostly survivals from ancient civilizations or are inherited from our savage ancestors.

A GREAT SCIENTIST

THE death of Prof. Albert Abraham Michelson marks the passing of one of the few great scientists of the world. Doctor Michelson was born in Germany in 1852. Accompanied by his parents he came to America when but a little child. His first academic degree was granted in 1873 by the United States Naval academy at Annapolis in which institution he later became professor of physics. After serving in this same capacity in several of our largest universities he became head of the department of physics in the University of Chicago.

In 1907 he was awarded the Nobel prize. Doctor Michelson's most important contribution to science was the discovery of a method of measuring light. A vacuum tube, a mile in length, was one piece of apparatus used in this very delicate task. This experiment was the life-long study of the great scientist and to it he sacrificed the best years of his life. His devotion to his work was also witnessed in his act of spending upon his experimental work the entire amount of money he received his Nobel prize.

Doctor Michelson died a comparatively poor man, but by means of his voluntary poverty the world has been greatly enriched. It is said that the experiments of Doctor Michelson's laboratory suggested to Einstein his theory of relativity.

One of the characteristics of the great scientist was his lack of appreciation of money. He cared little or nothing for it. He lived in a world where other values were of greater importance than money; yet, one writer remarks: "The United States has not had, in this generation, a greater economic asset than Albert Michelson." His unselfishness enabled him to pursue his investigations with the purest motives and highest possible altruistic spirit, never thinking about his personal reward. He was rewarded, however, for shortly before his death, those qualified to pass judgment announced to him that his measurement of the velocity of light was an indisputable success. Such moral energy will not die. It will contribute to the well-being of the world of men. Like the concentric circles of the water of the ocean, the influence of this great scientist will furnish both stimulation and inspiration to succeeding generations.

Alfalfa and Clover Are Favored for Farm Stock

Oats hay may be fed to beef cattle but it is not as efficient as clover or alfalfa hay. Oats hay corresponds very closely to timothy hay in composition. It is much lower in protein, is not eaten with quite so much relish as legume hay and does not have the conditioning and laxative effect of the latter. Alfalfa hay contains 10.6 per cent digestible protein, 30 per cent carbohydrates and 0.9 per cent fat.

Clover hay carries 7.5 per cent protein, 36 per cent carbohydrates and 1.8 per cent fat.

Oats hay only 3.4 per cent protein, 35.4 per cent carbohydrates and 1.2 per cent fat.

COTTONSEED MEAL FOR LIVE STOCK

Especially Valuable Protein Feed for Dairy Cows.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Cattlemen and other live stock owners who need a feed high in protein to supplement home-grown roughages will find cottonseed meal or cake satisfactory, according to information given in Farmers' Bulletin 1179-F, Feeding Cottonseed Products to Live Stock. This bulletin has just been issued in revised form by the United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. Cottonseed meal stimulates the appetite of fattening animals and causes them to consume more feed and likewise to make greater gains.

Cottonseed meal is a valuable protein feed for dairy cows, as the bulletin shows, one pound of good-quality cottonseed meal furnishes as much digestible protein as three pounds of wheat bran. The addition of cottonseed meal to rations for high-producing dairy cows, however, renders the rations satisfactory only so far as the protein requirement is concerned.

Beef cattle on pasture may be fed cottonseed cake or meal as a fattening ration with satisfactory results. Hogs may also be fed cottonseed meal in limited quantities as a protein supplement. Horses, however, should receive only cottonseed meal of good quality and in limited quantities, not more than one pound daily for a horse weighing 1,000 pounds if digestive disturbances are to be avoided.

The bulletin shows how to compare various grades of cottonseed meal or cake and how to select the feed which supplies a pound of protein at the least cost. A number of suggested rations which include cottonseed products are listed and the results of several experiments show the value of supplemental feeding of animals on pasture. Copies of Farmers' Bulletin 1179-F may be obtained on application to the Office of Information, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Principal Essentials in McLean Sanitation Plan

The main essentials in the McLean system of swine sanitation are, to get the sow and pigs on land that is free from worm infestation. It is the old story of prevention being worth more than cure.

There will be modifications of the four points, which are given below, to meet your needs, but as long as you carry out the aims of the work you should get results. The four things necessary for success are:

First, wash the sow thoroughly before she is put into the farrowing house, which has been scrubbed with boiling lye water. Second, confine sow and pigs to the farrowing house, if it is on polluted soil, until they are ready to move to a clean pasture.

Third, do not drive the sow and pigs from the farrowing house or clean quarters across polluted ground to the clean alfalfa or clover field where there have been no hogs for at least a year. Fourth, do not allow the pigs access to old pastures, lots, roadways or any places where they can become infested with worm eggs until they are at least four months of age.

Live Stock Facts

A clean start for pigs has a real cash value at marketing time.

When pigs are five or six weeks old, they should have middlings or shorts and tankage or cob meal.

More than two-thirds of all the cattle infected with tuberculosis have been slaughtered since 1917, federal authorities estimate.

Feeding hogs in pens at loading time or in lots immediately before loading increases death losses in transit by 25 to 30 per cent.

Heavy feeding and no exercise on Sunday or rainy days are bad for horses. Be sure to reduce the feed when the work stock is idle.

If wheat cannot be sold at profit on a 50-cent per bushel price, it may be utilized with off-grade peas and cheap forage for sheep, swine or cattle feed, and turned into a profit.

Mystery of Nature in Memory of the Salmon

The salmon has a memory that goes back through the ages. It, too, is really a sea fish. At some remote time the salmon was forced in self-defense to take the rivers for spawning purposes. The young salmon is defenseless, a weak (and very palatable) mite. Those races of salmon that ascended the rivers survived; others were wiped out by foes. From the spring onwards salmon begin to run up the rivers. They do not feed in fresh water, but live on their accumulated stores of fat. In the autumn they lay their eggs in holes that they scoop out in the gravel. Once they have spawned, the mature salmon drops back to the sea, though only about one in ten survives.

Three months later the young salmon emerge from the eggs. For some weeks they have very small powers of movement. They hide under small stones. At first they do not need to search for food, since each is born with a tiny food bag attached to it. A little later they began to forage for themselves and then they start to grow. In a year the infant salmon is from three to five inches in length. He may spend a second year in the river, but he cannot stay longer, for nature urges him to seek the well-stocked feeding grounds of the sea.

Here his growth is prodigious. He may increase from two ounces to forty pounds in four or five years, living on shrimps, prawns, sprats, and herrings. Where the salmon goes to when he reaches the sea no one knows. But when he feels the call to seek a mate, ancestral memory takes him back to the river. Still more surprising, it makes him seek that very river in which he was born.

Coot, Properly Cooked, Makes Excellent Dish

Many hunters find the common coot, or mudhen, a real gastronomic treat, and where ducks and geese are scarce the coot can very well take their place. For that matter biologists of the United States Department of Agriculture say that the coot is not to be despised as food under any circumstances. An excellent recipe for cooking coot is furnished by George E. Muehbach, superintendent of the Bear River marshes of Great Salt Lake, Utah. Mr. Muehbach says that cooked in the following manner coot is equal to any duck we have:

Skin the birds and cut off legs and breast. Split breast in two parts. Wash all parts thoroughly in cold water and, if desired, soak them a few hours in salt or soda water, but this is not necessary, as skinned coot has no strong or unpleasant flavor.

Roll damp meat in flour and place in frying pan over a slow fire. Cover pan and allow to fry slowly in either bacon grease or lard. Keep pan covered and after meat has cooked for about thirty minutes add a generous lump of butter. Get pan hot and then pour in a half to one cup of cold water (quantity to be gauged by size of pan and number to be served). Replace tight cover and allow to steam about a minute or two. Remove meat, add sufficient flour to thicken gravy, and serve.

Sounds mighty tempting!

Many American Indians

Recent estimates show there are 340,541 Indians enumerated at 82 federal agencies located in 25 states, and there are 7,923 Indians living in states in which there are no agencies. Oklahoma has the most Indians, 121,531; Arizona next with 45,350, followed in order by New Mexico, South Dakota, California, Minnesota, Montana, Washington, Wisconsin, North Dakota, Grinnell's Indians of Today" gives the number of reservations as 180, scattered through 27 states. Some of the largest tribes are the Navaho, Choctaw, Apache, Sioux, Hopi, Crow, Chippewa, Cherokee, Arapaho, etc. In the census of 1910 there were found to be representatives of 280 Indian tribes in this country.

"Urban Population"

Heretofore it has been defined by the census bureau that the term "urban population" includes all cities and other incorporated places having 2,500 inhabitants or more. For use in connection with the 1930 census the definition has been extended to include townships and other similar political subdivisions (not incorporated as municipalities) which have a total population of 10,000 or more and a population density of 1,000 or more per square mile.

MORE WARNING, DETOUR SIGNS FOR OILED ROADS

"Indiana's great mileage of paved highways has made the motorists of our state less tolerant of dust or fresh oil, but the driving hazard, discomfort and ravages caused by clouds and fogs of dust from state highways, to cars, passengers, clothes, fields, trees and homes along such highways are greatly lessened by efficient road oiling. The second most important thing about such oiling is for the motorist to be warned in time to avoid fresh oil if possible by using a detour if available or at worst, he must be warned against the danger of driving unexpectedly onto a freshly oiled stretch of road, particularly on a curve or down grade." Such were the comments of M. E. Noblet, Secretary of the Hoosier State Automobile Association who states that as a result of different conferences with the state highway officials the motoring public will receive improved service this year as compared to last year,—for example, more and better signs, more and better marked detours and more efficient oiling as a result of last year's experience.

"The motorist," said Mr. Noblet, "will be interested in some of the facts other than just the driving conditions. Last year there was a total of 614 miles of state highways oiled. There will be about an equal mileage oiled this year. Oiling of roads is not all alike. Some oiling is for just a very temporary use and in such cases a diluted lubricating oil serves the purpose and is cheaper than oil used in other instances. This oil dries in two or three days and requires two or three applications if the dust is to be kept laid during the entire season. Such oil is also a little slicker."

"Over 400 miles of the total of 614 miles oiled last year was so oiled as to produce a surface mat. A heavier, slow drying oil is used for this but the drying is quickened by sprinkling asphalt over the oil and the asphalt also helps form the surface mat. The big advantage of the surface mat is that after the first season less amounts of oil are needed, the dust is more effectively laid and during rainy weather the road is also free from the muddy condition it otherwise would develop. The state highway department in no instance, uses tar for dust laying and the point about this is that oil is much more easily removed from an automobile than is tar but oil should be wiped off just as soon as practical and not allowed to stay on the car for days as it is then harder to remove. This year probably another 400 miles of state road oiling will be of the type to form a surface mat."

"Last year there were not enough signs up to adequately warn the traveling public. But like anything else it takes experience to develop efficiency."

This year the highway department expects to establish detours around fresh oil where ever possible and mark said detours. Also put up a master sign at each end of road oiled projects explaining what is being done and also put up a sign at all intersecting roads between. That is a big task and in their efforts the highway men are entitled to the cooperation of the public and a little appreciation and praise hurts nobody."

SAVE A FEW OF THE BEST EARLY COCKERELS

(By Prof. W. B. Krueck)

There is a temptation under present conditions with broiler prices as they are, for a great many poultrymen and farmers to sell all of their early, rapid developing cockerels.

Where this is practiced in some cases the breeder or feeder selects from the remaining cockerels his breeding stock for the following year. If this practice is continued over a period of years, it is bound to lower the vitality and quality of the breeding males in the flock.

The early, vigorous, rapid developing cockerel is the type of bird that will build up vitality and vigor in the average farm flock. Therefore, a few of the best type from your early hatches should be saved because they will be more mature and will build strength, vitality and early maturity in the flock from year to year.

In too many cases farmers wait to buy their cockerels until very shortly before breeding time. Where this is done, often a slow maturing bird has had considerable time to develop and may look relatively good. The man who picks his breeding cockerels early when the slow maturing birds are a long way behind, can detect them and use only the early birds that will build permanent vigor and vitality into his flock.

IS YOUR POULTRY FLOCK PROFITABLE?

(By Prof. H. D. Munroe)

When egg prices are low many of us complain. If a flock is not making profit something must be done. Good feeding and summer culling will result in a profitable flock even if egg prices seem low. It requires 3 pounds of mash and 3 pounds of scratch to feed a hen a month.

At 50% production on 300 hens we will make $4.50 per month.
At 60% on 300 hens we can make $13.50 per month.
High egg production is necessary when egg prices are low.
Cull the non-producers; feed a moist laying mash each day; keep dry laying mash before them at all times and feed eight pounds of scratch per 100 hens per day. This will result in high production and a profit.

"the Truth for which our ancestors fought and suffered..."

"SIRENS still sing the song of the easy way for the moment of difficulty, but the common sense of the common man, the inherited tradition of an independent and self-reliant race, the historical memory of Americans who glory in Valley Forge even as they glory in Yorktown—all these tell us the truth for which our ancestors fought and suffered, the truth which echoes upward from this soil of blood and tears, that the way to the nation's greatness is the path of self-reliance, independence and steadfastness in times of trial and stress."

The following excerpts are from the address of President Hoover delivered at Memorial Day, 1931 at Valley Forge, Pennsylvania in the specious claim that everybody collectively owes each of us individually an opportunity to earn a living, and the equally specious claim that hired representatives of a hundred million people can do better than the people themselves in thinking and planning their daily life.

"The revolution of which Valley Forge was the darkest but perhaps the most glorious moment, was fought not alone for national independence but to retain our freedom to continue unhampered the most promising social experiment in all human history."

"We must ever continue that fight. Amid the scene of vastly growing complexity of our economic life we must preserve the independence of the individual from the deadening restraints of government, yet by the strong arm of government equally protect his individual freedom, assure his fair chance, his equality of opportunity from the encroachments of special privileges and greed or domination by any group or class."

FORMER ST. JOE CITIZEN DIES IN OKLAHOMA

Mrs. Nancy Hindman of Jackson township sends The News the funeral announcement of Mrs. Ida Florence Barney, of Mountain View, Okla. Mrs. Barney will be remembered as the wife of Frank Barney, citizens of St. Joe in former years. She passed away June 23, at the age of 87 years, 2 months and 15 days, and the funeral was held at the home south of Mountain View on June 24, with burial in the Mountain View cemetery. The note accompanying the notice stated that Mrs. Barney had not been well for the past two years and that she suffered a stroke on June 16, and was unconscious for two days, when she rallied slightly and the children thought she recognized them.

The Barney family is now composed of three children, Emmons, Gladys and Carter, while Mr. and Mrs. Barney and one son, have passed on.

At the time the Barney family lived in St. Joe they resided for many years in the homes now owned by Foster Gee and Roy Koch.

Mr. Barney was engaged in the elevator and grain business, and purchased wool in large quantities. In later years he was in the restaurant business in the brick building that stood at the east of The News office.

DEMANDS TITLE TO STOCK IN ST. JOE VALLEY BANK

An action to quiet title to five shares of stock in the St. Joe Valley bank of St. Joe, has been instituted in the DeKalb circuit court by R. J. Roepke of Whitelaw, Wis., against Frank W. Silberg of Butler, and the bank.

The plaintiff states that last November 20 E. C. Vogt borrowed $130 from the Whitelaw State bank, and an additional $170 on Dec. 1, payable in 90 days and that Silberg posted the five shares of stock as security. The notes were not paid when due and the bank offered the stock at private sale. The plaintiff states that he bid the stock in at $390.

However, says the plaintiff, when he requested the St. Joe Valley bank to transfer the stock on its books the bank officers refused to do so, stating that Silberg had notified them to that effect. The court is asked to quiet the title in the stock in the plaintiff's favor. His attorney is Capt. H. C. Springer.

Pleatings Solve Many Problems

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Pleatings, and an abundance of them solve a majority of the trimming problems in fashion's realm this season. A lavish use of fine knife pleating results in none other than ultra chic for the costume. The model pictured gives emphasis to the charm of the new pleated trimmings. It also goes to show how prettily printed materials, especially the popular dotted effects yield to pleated treatments.

If you would like to know about the smart umbrella to which this up-to-date young woman seems to be wanting to call attention we do not mind telling you a secret, or perhaps it is the handsome leather bag which she carries which holds the secret. Anyway, to make a long story short, the umbrella is made to fold up so it can be stowed away in a certain little compartment zipper-top bag without anyone ever suspecting such a thing. Clever, is it not, and well worth following up when next you go to buy a new umbrella-and-bag ensemble.

But about this matter of decorative pleatings which are having so much to do with the swank of the mode this season, one need not hesitate to en-play this form of trimming at any time for they adorn the simplest everyday print frocks with as much distinction as they enhance the most exquisite and exclusive evening gowns. As to pleating the daytime prints,

It has become the rule rather than the exception. A favorite use of fine knife pleating is to border both blouse and skirt with it.

Have you tried trimming with pleated lace? If you are making a blouse or a dress of allover lace, for instance, cut strips of any width which may happen to suit your fancy. Have them pleated and edged and pleated. You will find that these pleated frills give a beautiful finish to all edges.

Enthusiasm for pleating also carries into the coat realm this season. Full-length coats of either light woolen or silk are given very youthful and flattering lines in that they are bordered about the bottom with pleated flounces of considerable depth, the pleating repeated on the now-so-fashionable three-quarter sleeves and if there be a cape collar it is also finished with pleating. ## Chiffon and Sequins in Mode for Evening Wear

Chiffon and sequins have come to a novel agreement for the skirt of an evening gown that is very full and cut on the bias to make it swing and swirl like a bell when the wearer is dancing. The chiffon is printed in large pink roses on a black background. The sequins agreed to let the roses stay soft and pink and untouched if they would agree to let all the black spaces behind them go sequin.

The surprise comes in the cape accompanying and on which background and flowers have completely changed places. The spaces are in chiffon and the roses in colored sequins!

Some Timely Food Suggestions

By NELLIE MAXWELL

The cook who really enjoys mixing ingredients as a painter does his colors, will find no limit to the delightful dishes which one may originate or enlarge upon with the materials at hand. One must follow a few fundamental principles in cookery, and after that let the imagination soar, for there is no end to inspiration. After some experience with handling foods, most toothsome dishes may be prepared from bits of leftovers. The cook who wastes nothing, but serves her food in a dainty, appetizing manner, is a real genius and her talents are ever in demand.

It is not always wise to tell all one knows as to the contents of a dish, for some conscientious objectors will refuse to try a madeover dish, or rearranged food.

Now, who will dare to call a steamed pudding a leftover? Yet one may prepare a most tasty one with a few squares of corn bread, cupful of leftover cocoa, a bit of oatmeal, a few raisins and a couple of egg yolks left from some icing or dessert.

Use the things you have at hand—anyone who knows little about foods can prepare a good meal if the market can be called upon with no regard to expense.

Do you use the half-cupful, more or less, of leftover ice cream in a cake or pudding?

With a few whole berries may be spread over the cake if desired.

Sponge Cake.
4 eggs 1 cup sugar 1 tsp. baking pow.
1 cup cold water 1/2 cup salt
1 cup sifted soft 1/2 cup vanilla wheat flour 1/2 cup lemon juice

Separate the egg yolks from the whites, and beat the yolks well. Gradually beat in the sugar, add the water, and continue the beating until the mixture is very thick and light. Sift the dry ingredients together and fold them into the egg and sugar mixture. Then fold in the stiffly beaten whites of the eggs, add the flavoring, and bake in a slightly greased shallow pan in a moderate oven (325 degrees F.) for 45 to 50 minutes.

Correct Posture Is Important

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

While the lady in the picture suggests rather the old verse "Gather ye rosebuds while ye may, Old Time is still a-flying—," a home gardener examining shrubs for insect pests—one is struck immediately by her beautiful carriage.

Her posture is the ideal, easy standing position for which we should all strive. It is necessary for her to lean forward slightly to examine her rambling roses, but in doing so she has kept her back flat and straight, her head, shoulders and hips in line with her ankles, and she uses her feet properly to balance herself.

The picture is from a series of charts on good posture prepared by the extension service of the United States Department of Agriculture. These talks on posture include advice on the proper position for all sorts of home activities, both outdoors and indoors. The charts indicate by analogy with indoor tasks, that for garden work, too, such as digging, weeding, planting, and tasks that require stooping, it is possible to carry on the job and at the same time avert the fatigue that comes from bad position maintained for long stretches. Work close to the ground, for example, can be done on a kneeling pad, with the back straight and the shoulders flat; hoeing and raking can be done like mopping or sweeping, keeping the abdomen and hips in the correct position and the feet squarely on the ground. Pruning, watering and gathering garden products are, similarly, much less fatiguing if good posture is maintained while carrying them on.

Dainty Dishes for Afternoon Tea

Cream Cheese is Useful for Making Sandwiches.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Some particularly appetizing ways of using cream cheese in lunch dishes and for afternoon tea are illustrated in this photograph from the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. The salad of green peppers, stuffed with cream cheese, is served with crisp lettuce leaves on a green glass salad plate. It tempts by color and texture as well as by its flavors. Canned pimientos could have been stuffed for a red salad, or such fruits as prunes, figs, and cheese salad. Large cherries, too, are good with cream cheese stuffing or with cheese balls and mayonnaise dressing.

For afternoon tea, dainty rolled and open sandwiches made with cream cheese will usually prove popular. The open sandwiches consist of a cracker covered with cheese and decorated with red jelly.

Neufchatel and cream cheeses are valuable for the protein, fat, phosphorus and calcium they furnish to the diet. They may be introduced into almost any meal—as part of the appetizer at the beginning of a dinner or of the dessert at the end, and in any course between. Gingerbread with a cream cheese filling, shown in the picture, is an excellent dessert for lunch or dinner. Here are recipes for the gingerbread and the filling.

both from the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Gingerbread.

1/2 cup fat 1/2 cup soda
1/2 cup sugar 1/2 cup salt
1 cup molasses 1/2 cup ginger
1 egg 1 cup cloves
2 cups sifted soft 1/2 cup cinnamon wheat flour 1 cup milk

Cream together the sugar and fat. Add the molasses and beaten egg. Sift together twice the dry ingredients and add to the first mixture alternately with the milk. Bake in two shallow pans in a moderate oven (350 degrees F.) for 30 or 40 minutes. Serve with cream cheese or whipped cream. One cup of sour milk may be used instead of the sweet milk. In that case, use one scant teaspoon of soda in place of the one-half teaspoon now called for, and use only two teaspoons of baking powder.

Cream Cheese Filling for Gingerbread.
1/2 cup soft butter 1/2 cup salt
1/2 cup cream cheese 1 cup milk
1 cup chopped nuts

Mash the cheese and mix with it enough cream to give it the consistency of a soft filling. Add the nuts and salt, and mix well. Split open a loaf of hot gingerbread, spread the cheese mixture on the lower half, replace the upper part and press it down lightly. Serve the gingerbread at once while still hot.

TALES... of the TRIBES

By EDITHA L. WATSON

The Skidi

It is not every tribe which can boast of being organized by the stars, but the twenty-two villages of the Skidi, a Pawnee tribe, made that claim.

It was said that the stars gave shrines named for them to certain men, and that the villages took their names either from the shrines or from some incident of their bestowal. The stars also "made them into families and villages, taught them how to live and how to perform their ceremonies." These rites began with the first thunder of spring, and ended when the long winter sleep set in. One of the most important of these ceremonies was the sacrifice of a girl, impersonating the evening star, to the morning star, and the last of these sacrifices became a drama equal to that of Pocahontas and Capt. John Smith.

At this time (the early part of the Nineteenth century), the Skidi chief had a son, Petateshoro ("Chief of Men"), who was everything to be admired in a man. Tall, of fine physique and handsome face, the young chief was as brave as a lion and as wise as an old man, and with all these qualities he also had a tender heart. His exploits of chivalry and his quickness and daring had won him the respect and admiration of all his tribe.

The day came for the sacrifice to the morning star. A Comanche maid, on had been captured by Skidi raiders some time before, and it had been decided to offer her, rather than some girl of their own tribe, to the stellar deity. The unfortunate captive was bound to a framework, and the rites were commencing, when Petateshoro appeared upon the scene.

In a ringing speech, he declared his and his father's opposition to such a ceremony, and their determination to end the custom. He daringly offered his own life in place of the captive's, should he fail to rescue her. Then, while his tribesmen were still under the influence of his surprising words and action, Petateshoro cut the thongs which bound the Comanche girl, lifted her in his arms, and rushed with her through the crowd to where he had prepared saddled horses. They mounted and galloped away while the Skidi were recovering their wits, and were able to ride so fast and so far as to avoid all pursuit.

It would make a pretty romance if the historian were able to state that Petateshoro and the Comanche maiden fell in love. However, it appears that such was not the case, for at the end of the ride, the handsome young Skidi brave presented the girl with a package of food and advised her to travel on until she came to her own people (who were some 400 miles away), while he rode back to his own village and nonchalantly took his place again among the men whom he had so cleverly outwitted.

This dramatic scene marked the end of the evening star sacrifice.

Besides the story of Petateshoro, there is not a great deal to relate about the Skidi tribe. They were a member of the Pawnee confederacy, and it is said that centuries ago the Arickara were one people, who later separated, the Skidi family settling on Loup River, Neb., where they lived for two hundred years.

The tribe is also known as the "Wolf Pawnee," or "Pawnee Loup," as the French called them, and doubtless the river received its name from the tribe who lived along it for so many years. This is one of the puzzles of Indian lore: why the tribe, instead of referring to the celestial patronage and calling themselves "Children of the Stars," should affiliate with the wolves and be named for them.

The later history of the Skidi is that of many another tribe. They first fought against the white invaders, and to this end acquired as many horses as possible, so that horses became the standard of wealth among them. They later joined the whites and fought with them, signed treaties, and finally moved to Oklahoma, where they live today as United States citizens, owning their lands in severalty. Tradition tells us of their star-guided origin and of their early wanderings, many years before their settlement of the Loup river district. History has preserved the story of Petateshoro and the Comanche maid, and of the treaties which brought the Skidi closer to the government of the white men. The present finds them, their glories departed, assimilating with their conquerors, a people of little importance, whose passing would be no more marked than the sinking of a stone in the waters of Loup river. (© 1931, Western Newspaper Union.)

Hominy, succotash, samp, maple sugar, Johnny cake, and many other dishes were taught to the white people by the Algonquian tribes.

The Indians were found to be unsuited to many tasks, so negro slaves were introduced into America in 1501 to take their places.

"Whistling root," a magic plant of the Mohegans, was believed to whistle and then disappear, when placed upon a rock.

Salento, separated into thin sheets, was formerly used as window lights by the Pueblo.

Serving was done by men and women alike, among the Indians, and men made their own clothing.

EXCITED TALKING

Now the wind and the thunder and the lightning were all having a party. They all got very much excited talking and boasting, and the storm became worse and worse.

Shutters came off from windows.

Terrible Streaks and Darts of Lightning.

plants in gardens were knocked over and some were knocked quite flat. Benches and chairs which had been left in gardens or on the porches were overturned.

But the wind said when the storm was all over he was going to be quiet and rest for awhile.

"Well, this has done me good," he said.

"I do believe, too, that it has done the grown-ups and children good."

"They have day after day of sunshine, and now they know that old Mr. Sun isn't the only creature in the world."

"There is the storm wind, King and Queen Thunder and the Lightning children."

Now the storm was over for a little while, but do you know that old King Thunder and Old Queen Thunder and the Lightning children and Mr. Wind found that they had forgotten a number of things they had wanted to say to each other.

The people down on the earth said to each other:

"It seemed as though the storm was over a few minutes ago, but the sky is growing dark again now."

"I believe we are going to have another storm—and so soon after the first one, too."

It was true and Mr. Wind came rushing along.

"I forgot to tell you that I thought you were a fine fellow, King Thunder," he said.

"Thank you, thank you," rumbled the deep voice of King Thunder, "and I feel the same way about you."

Mr. Wind made a low bow, and as he did so he made such a sweeping one that everything that was in his way was caught up in the air and thrown about.

"I admire you so much, too, Queen Thunder," said Mr. Wind in a whistling tone of voice.

"Thank you," said Queen Thunder. "I'm much complimented."

And her voice was low and deep and quite terrific.

"You're such bright, brilliant, flashing, clever children, you Lightning children," said Mr. Wind.

"Ah, we're so glad you like us. We'll do the best we can. We'll try to do better now for you, too, because of your kind words and your praise."

"What terrible streaks and darts of lightning," said the Earth people.

"The storm seems to be getting worse all the time."

Oh, the earth people thought the storm was a terrific one.

But the Wind, King Thunder, Queen Thunder and the Lightning children thought it was lovely.

Only Mr. Wind did a very naughty thing. Some one had forgotten to take in some sheets that had been hanging out to dry—great, big sheets that were heavy to wash.

Didn't Mr. Wind just knock them to the ground and over on a dirt path so they had to be washed all over again?

Naughty Mr. Wind!

With his English wife, Catherine, and son, Jesse, Henry Bulain, French settler in Canada in 1740, cultivates a farm adjacent to the Tontour seigneurie. As the story opens the Bulgains are returning from a visit to the Tontour. Catherine's wandering brother, Hespah, meets them with presents for the family. To Jesse he gives a pistol, bidding him perfect himself in marksmanship.

CHAPTER III

Henri and his wife sat up late with Hespah Adams, for this time Hespah had come with a set and determined purpose to his sister's home. The trader's countenance had grown stern, and Catherine's cheeks were like those of a pale nun in the candlelight. In Henri Bulain's face were still the cheer and good humor and untroubled equanimity of confidence and faith that Hespah, with the darkest pictures he had painted, had been unable to disturb.

They were talking about war. As early as this spring of 1740, the American wilderness had begun to stir with whispers of the impending conflagration which was destined soon to turn the eastern part of the continent into a seething pot of fury and death.

While George the Second of England and Louis the Fifteenth of France were playing at friendship after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, France gnawed for breath with the flower of her armies buried on European battlefields, and England with her fighting forces reduced on land to eighteen thousand men and to less than seven thousand on the sea. The vast colonies of the two countries, working out their own salvations, were steadily and surely and with deadly intent encroaching upon each other.

The stage was set for the writing of the bloodiest and most picturesque pages in American history. Southward from the Richelieu were the borders of all the white men's enemies, the warriors of the Six Nations, and northward, sweeping east and west through the Canadas, were the forty scattered tribes who bore allegiance to New France. Behind these savage hordes, on one side, were eleven hundred thousand English colonists holding the sea-coast lands from Maine to Georgia, and on the other less than eighty thousand souls, counting women and children as well as men, to defend and hold the illimitable domains of New France, which reached from the upper Canadas to the Gulf of Mexico and from the Alleghenies to the Rocky mountains.

Of this alarming disparity in power of fighting men, and of the pitiless scourge which he swore would come day sweep through all the country of Lake Champlain and the Richelieu, Hespah Adams had spoken at length but with small effect on Henri Bulain.

"Let war come if it must," said Henri. "The heart of New France is set behind an impenetrable wall of rock and forest, and with these ramparts in our favor, eighty thousand will be a match for the million English of the day. It is neutral ground, and we, being neutral, are fitly placed here. Onidas and Mohawks have eaten under our roof as well as Hurons and Algonquins, and when deadly enemies such as these meet thus on common ground, what cause have we for fear?"

A light of pride glowed in Catherine's eyes as she listened to her husband's words, and she added:

"Henri loves the Indians, and I have grown to love them, too. They are all our friends."

"Friends!" snorted Hespah. "Henri, it is because of Catherine and Jesse that I call you a fool. Take them where this danger does not hang day and night along the edges of the frontiers. Take them to the St. Lawrence, if you will, or bring them south into Catherine's country. But do one or the other, for God's sake, or the day will come when Christ himself cannot save you, and his voice shook with earnestness."

"There will be no war," insisted Henri stubbornly. "England and France have bled themselves white on Continental battlefields, and the peace which was signed only last October will surely not be broken again while you and I are living, for Hanover and Austria have had their fill, as well as the others, and are like two dead men on their backs."

"That is right," nodded Catherine, with a shudder. "I think all fighting is over for many years."

"Fools—innocents!" her brother growled. "I tell you neither George nor Louis will have anything to do with the running of this war until every mile of woods between our colonies and your city of Quebec is red with fire and blood. God love me, it has already begun! French and English traders are fighting wherever they come together along the frontiers, and the hired Indians of one are taking scalps for the other. Even white men have joined in that pretty game, for Massachusetts has sent out Lovewell and his fifty men to hunt the heads of Indians and French—it makes no difference which, though the order says redskins only—at a price of five shillings a day plus a bounty for every scalp that is taken; and down in New York country Sir William Johnson counts out English money for human hair, while the French—and you know it, Henri—are paying a hundred crowns apiece for white scalps as well as red. It's hair the Indians are bringing in instead of fur. And here you sit like a couple of foolish doves with a young one in the nest, your scalps worth fifty pounds a piece, your windows open, your door unlocked, your senses gone."

Catherine rose from her seat and came around to her brother so that she stood behind him with her arms about his shoulders. "Hespah, we know this you have told us is true," she said, pressing her cheek against his face. "There is terrible murder along the frontiers from which you have come, and that is why Henri has brought Jesse and me into this country of his where are only peace and friendship and no thought of the hideous killings and ugly traffickings you speak about. You have argued against yourself, Brother, for it is in you who should move out of strife and danger and come to live with us."

"Together we will have a paradise here," urged Henri.

"And I will find you a wife," added Catherine. "A wife who will love you greatly, and until you have children of your own we will give you half of Jesse."

Hespah rose gently out of her arm.

"For Jesse you should change your home to a place where there is a schoolmaster and more for him to learn," he said, catching desperately at a last argument where all others had failed.

"In all of New France and the English colonies there is no better teacher than our Catherine," answered Henri proudly. "In English and French she has given to Jesse more than he could ever have learned in your town of Albany or our college in Quebec; for there, in one place, he would have been English, and in the other, French, while here he is both, like his father, and mother, and will never strike at either of the two bloods that are in his veins."

"Of that I am sure," agreed Catherine. "I pray God my Jesse will never be a fighting man."

When Hespah went to his cot in the loft, he stood for a moment with his lighter candle beside Jesse's head where the boy lay sleeping with the cloth of velvet close to his hands, a smile on his lips. Looking down on him Hespah thought of Henri Bulain's last words and his sister's prayer, and his lips moved whisperingly to himself. "They can't keep it from you, lad—hope nor prayer nor all their faith. It's coming, and when it comes you'll strike and strike hard, and it's then you'll be what you're bound to be, Jesse—a fighting man!"

Catherine's breakfast was on the table with the break of sunrise, and Jesse was even ahead of that, helping his father with the chops. The ox was fed and the cart ready for the rough travel before his Uncle Hespah came down from his sleep. Talk of war and massacre and death had left no shadow in Catherine's heart, and Hespah could hear her singing. The sound of her voice made him pause and face the south. His wide shoulders twitched, and he marked the swelling and dips of the timbered solitudes of Forbidden valley, and saw where the Mohawks would enter it.

Boosts Golfer Toward Coveted "Hole in One"

"In the history of the world it is not likely that any game or pastime has been given quite so much serious attention as the game of golf. Half of the men and women who have played golf seem to have invented some sort of a gadget to improve the possibility of making a perfect score and if all the inventions of this character were placed and to end they would probably reach to some place or other and back again several times. An enthusiastic Englishman, points with pride to a device which he has invented to enable the player to determine whether he and his club are in exactly the proper position before attempting to bang the ball. He has a small stand containing an electric light operated by a dry battery and this is placed with great care upon the ground. In the head of his club he has a mirror inserted and when he takes up his position in front of the ball and holds his club in exactly correct angle, the light from the lamp will be reflected through the mirror to the eye of the player. Then, if the wind is just right and no one sneezes just as the play is about to be made, the player may make a hole in one, or he certainly will have the excuse that he tried.

THE GIFT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

LESSON TEXT—Acts 1:6-14; 2:1-8. GOLDEN TEXT—But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth. PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus' Friends Carrying on His Work. JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus' Friends Carrying on His Work. INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Coming of New Power. YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Empowered for a World Task.

1. The Holy Spirit Promised (Acts 1:6-8). The disciples' question (v. 6). They said, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" They were right in their expectation of the kingdom, for it had been covenanted to David (II Sam. 7:16), predicted by the prophets, and declared to be at hand by John the Baptist and Christ himself. However, they were in darkness as to the calling and establishing of the church.

2. Times and seasons in God's hands (v. 7). Christ turned their attention from the desire to know times and seasons, which belong alone to God, to their supreme duty. The Christian's supreme obligation is to preach repentance and remission of sins through the shed blood of Jesus Christ to all the world (Luke 24:46-48) in the power of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:8).

3. The missionary program (v. 8). The Holy Spirit came to empower them to preach the gospel to the world. a. In Jerusalem. This witnessing was done by the twelve immediately following Pentecost. b. In Judea and Samaria after the hands of wicked persecutors were laid upon them. c. Unto the uttermost parts of the earth. Beginning with the first foreign missionary enterprise this work has been carried on with varying degrees of success till the present time.

11. The Holy Spirit Working (Acts 2:1-8). 1. The time of (v. 1). It was on the "Day of Pentecost." Pentecost means fifty. It meant, therefore, the feast that was held fifty days after the wave sheaf was offered (Lev. 23:15, 16). It was observed by presenting two loaves made of new wheat (Lev. 23:17). These loaves were baked in the oven while leaven was excluded from the Passover Feast (Lev. 23:6). The reason for this was that the Passover Feast typified Christ's sacrificial death, while Pentecost represented the Church, composed of Jews and Gentiles—the two loaves.

2. Upon whom the Spirit came (v. 1). Cf. 1:13-15. The twelve and others to the number of 120. The gift of the Spirit was not merely for the twelve but for all believers.

3. Marks of the Spirit (vv. 2-8). a. The sound of a mighty wind (v. 2). This suggests the all pervasive life-giving power of the Holy Spirit. b. Tongues of flame (v. 3). Each of the 120 was crowned with such a tongue. "Tongues" show the practical purpose of the Spirit's gifts, and "fire" indicates his purifying energy.

c. Speaking in other tongues (v. 4, 8). Men of every nation heard the gospel in their own tongue.

111. The Holy Spirit Working (Acts 2:14-47). 1. Peter's sermon (vv. 14-40). This sermon is as wonderful as the gift of tongues. It demonstrates the presence and power of the Spirit, because Peter was a Galilean fisherman without literary training. His analysis is perfect. He begins with a brief defense and scriptural explanation of the phenomenon of tongues (vv. 14-21), and follows by a threefold argument proving the messiahship of Jesus. In his conclusion he appealed to them to repent and be baptized in the name of Jesus.

2. Three thousand converted (v. 24). Many people were convicted of their sin.

3. The abiding fellowship (vv. 42-47). The evidence that the Spirit had really come and that his work was real was that a. The converts continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine (v. 42). b. They continued in fellowship with the apostles (v. 42). The surest way to grow is to keep in fellowship with Christians.

c. In using the means of grace (v. 42). They continued in the breaking of bread. God has instituted ordinances in his house.

d. In prayer (v. 42). The apostolic church was a praying church.

e. In praising God (v. 47). The experience of the indwelling Spirit issues in praise to God.

Everlasting Arms

Swords Into Plowshares

If swords are to be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks, where must that work begin? It must begin in the individual heart.—J. H. Jowett.

South American Bird

Thing of Rare Beauty

The obtaining of six specimens of "the most beautiful bird in the world"—the Cock-of-the-Rock—in a remote region along the Brazil-Venezuela border, has been reported to the National Geographic society by Ernest G. Holt, leader of an expedition which has been collecting natural history material for the society in South America.

The remarkable bird, which has been seen alive by but few travelers, is described by Mr. Holt as "a most gorgeous creature, orange or flame colored, with a double crest, and to my mind the most beautiful bird in the world." The beauty is concentrated in the male, for in few bird species is there a more striking contrast between the resplendent cock and the very drab and demure female. In size the Cock-of-the-Rock is between a robin and crow.

Around their camp at Salto do Hua, on the Brazil-Venezuela border, Mr. Holt's party found monkeys so numerous that the meat of the mammals was made a regular item on their menu. They also shot curassows or bush turkeys.

The Cock-of-the-Rock was found after the camp was moved eastward from the Rio Maturaca to the foothills of the Serra Ineri, a long, tortuous and little-known range of mountains that extends under various names to the frontier of British Guiana, where it culminates in Mount Roraima, some 10,000 feet in the boundaries of Venezuela, British Guiana and Brazil.

Find Builders' Secrets

in Cupola of Pantheon

Architects who have been repairing the cupola of the Pantheon, which with the Colosseum is the most important of Rome's monuments, claim they have discovered the secret of the building methods of the ancient Romans in flinging the vast arches of the dome up from the already high building on which it rests. The discoveries are of extreme importance from a technical point of view, it is said, for Michelangelo himself, who built the dome of Saint Peter's, admitted that he was baffled by the dome of Michelangelo, Brunelleschi, builder of the dome of the Florence cathedral, made careful measurements and studies of the Pantheon dome in preparation for his Florence project, but was never able to solve the mystery of how the old Roman architects worked.

Cylinder Made Air Pump

A new device that can be screwed into the spark plug hole of one of the auto's cylinders turns that cylinder into an air pump that will produce two and a half cubic feet of free air per minute. This much air is sufficient to spray oil paint, germicide, insecticide, and liquids, says Popular Science Monthly.

On the down stroke of the piston in the cylinder to which the device is fitted, the piston sucks in outside air through a spring-operated valve at the top of the cylinder. This valve closes and another opens, allowing the air to flow into a storage tank or into the pipe leading to the spray equipment. If more air is needed than can be obtained from one cylinder in this way, two of the devices can be used at the same time so as to double the output. It is designed to work at an engine speed equivalent to a road speed of 20 miles an hour.

Empty Honor

Many years ago a virulent disease broke out among the English army horses and killed them in droves. A young doctor, Griffith Evans, made blood tests, and discovered the germ that was causing the trouble—to be discredited by the army authorities, but he was right though, as ten years later the war office admitted. Now he is aged ninety-five, deaf and bed-ridden, living in obscurity at Bangor, in Wales. In recognition of his invaluable work he has just been given the freedom of the city.

Photographing Wills

Legal circles are concerned, for financial reasons, at the recent innovation by the government in photographing all wills. A supercamera and dark room were provided for the experiment, which is said to have had considerable success in the United States. The photographs of the wills will be placed on the most durable paper, and authorities maintain will outlive the present copies provided by lawyers.

OUT GOES THIS OLD WASHBOARD! I'VE FOUND AN EASY WAY TO GET BRIGHT SNOWY CLOTHES

Throws away washboard— gets whiter clothes than ever

"THANK goodness I'm not chained to this instrument of torture any more! Why should I break my back over a washboard, when I can get whiter, brighter clothes just by soaking! My washdays are so easy since I changed to Rinso. And the best of it is, this gentle way saves the clothes."

Great in tub or washer

Don't fool yourself. No soap gives the rich, lively, lasting suds that Rinso gives. Twice as much, cup for cup, as lightweight, pulled-up soaps. And no softener needed, even in hardest water.

These rich suds get clothes so white, even boiling isn't necessary. Marvelous in washers; the makers of 40 famous washers recommend it. And nothing like it for dishwashing! Get the big package.

WHAT A KEY BANKER DID FOR HIS COUNTY

The farmers of one county in Tennessee are receiving $400,000 additional annual income from new farm enterprises started since 1926 through the efforts of a "key banker" and the county agent, according to estimates from the Tennessee College of Agriculture. A "key banker" is a part of the state bankers' association voluntary field force cooperating with the American Bankers Association in its nationwide plan for bringing about better agricultural conditions through combined banker-farmer effort. New projects started in this particular county are tobacco, Irish potato and cabbage production for cash crops, and dairy and poultry raising for livestock.

The key banker, looking for something to do to better his community, first attempted to procure a county agent but was unable to get the county to make the necessary appropriation, so he and other leading citizens made up the requisite funds through private subscription among farmers and business men and an agent was employed.

Up until 1926 grain was the principal farm production in the county. The banker recognized the disadvantages of this. It afforded a low cash income, and the land was too hilly and rough for profitable grain raising. His idea was to introduce cash crops that offered more return per acre and were better fitted to the county. It was decided that the county should standardize on the Green Mountain potato and to market it in carload lots. Through his bank he sponsored the buying of a car of certified seed potatoes. He likewise bought some high quality tobacco seed and several hundred seedlings of purebred eggs. These supplies were distributed at cost through the banks to the farmers.

After considerable effort a market for dairy products was assured the farmers when in 1925 a national cheese company located a factory there. A county appropriation was secured for county agent work in 1928.

In 1929 the cash crop program resulted in farmers selling $45,000 worth of milk, $150,000 worth of tobacco and fifty-five carloads of potatoes and cabbage, mostly through cooperative sales. "This was some step from the $25,000 worth of cash crops in 1926," the county agent says, "and indications are that this amount will be doubled."

Banks Favor Diversification

Emphasis was placed on the strategic position the banker holds through the use of directed credit at a recent meeting of the Alabama bankers' agricultural committee. Alabama is confronted with the problem of over-production of cotton. The committee recommended that banks that credit be extended on the basis of a twenty-five per cent reduction in cotton acreage. The value of growing other crops than cotton was strongly stressed and county outlook meetings are being planned with the thought of bringing about a more balanced agricultural program in the various communities.

More People, Speedier Money

The more densely populated a locality the more rapid will be the velocity of circulation, because there will be ready access to people from whom money is received or to whom it is paid. A lady who has a city house and a country house states that in the country she keeps her money in her purse for weeks, whereas in the city she keeps it but a few days.

EUGENE WHITE AND WIFE DIES IN AUTO CRASH

The funeral of the late Mrs. Letitia White, wife of Eugene White, who met her death in an automobile collision five miles south of Garrett Thursday afternoon, was held at the home, three miles east of Spencer, Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock. The Rev. A. K. Mumma of Harlan, officiated and interment was made in Riverside cemetery at St. Joe.

The condition of Mr. White who was a patient at Sacred Heart hospital in Garrett, was serious from the time of the accident, when he died on Monday afternoon. His skull was fractured and he was injured internally. He was unconscious until Thursday night, when he partially regained consciousness.

An operation was performed Saturday afternoon to relieve the pressure on the brain.

Funeral services for Mr. White Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock at the home, the Rev. A. K. Mumma officiating. Burial will be in St. Joe cemetery.

A son, Albert, 14, was cut about the head and face, but was able to return home Friday night.

Francis A. Pitt of Indianapolis, a traveling salesman who was driving the other car figuring in the tragedy, was injured about the hips, but after Coroner John R. Clark talked to him and his wife they proceeded to Indianapolis by train Thursday night.

Pitt and his wife were on their way home on state road No. 27 from a vacation at Hamilton Lake. Mr. and Mrs. White and their son were driving to the farm near the scene of the crash owned by C. H. Heinzerling of Garrett, to make a visit with a son, Walter, who lives there. Mr. Pitt told the coroner that he was aware of the dangerous intersection of the Thrush road and as he went up the hill just north of the corner he slowed down. He was driving about forty-five miles an hour. As he was nearly to the corner he said the Ford sedan driven by Mr. White drove onto the pavement from the east. Mr. Pitt said he swerved his car and drove off the pavement in an effort to avoid a collision, but without avail. The Ford car was knocked about twenty feet and turned over. It then slid about twenty feet on the pavement.

Mr. and Mrs. White had been riding in the front seat and Albert was in the rear seat. All were thrown from the machine by the impact. Mr. White struck on his head, but was clear of the automobile. His wife was caught under the car and when it slid the top of her head was crushed off.

The body of Mrs. White was taken to the Geo. W. Iyer undertaking parlors in Garrett and later in the evening it was removed to the Roscoe Walter funeral home at Spencer.

Mrs. White was 53 years of age and was born near Spencer, living there all her life. Her maiden name was Letitia Bowman. Surviving besides the husband are six children, Lloyd and Albert at home, Clarence of Fort Wayne, Mrs. Mary Lantz of Leo, Mrs. Evelyn Johnson of near Grabbill, and Walter, living south of Garrett. Mrs. White's mother, Mrs. Amanda Parker, has been living with the White family and a brother of Mrs. White, John Bowman, resides at Gaylord, Mich.

Arabia's Kingdom

The Sacred Kaaba in Mecca.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

THE newest nation to be extended formal recognition by the United States is the kingdom of Hejaz and Nejd. It might almost be called the kingdom of Arabia, for it embraces the greater portion of that huge peninsula, including the vast sweep of the interior, parts of which have never been penetrated by white men. Importance is lent to the dual kingdom, too, by the fact that it includes the two holiest cities of holy cities of the Moslem world—Mecca and Medina. Mecca is the chief capital of Hejaz and Nejd.

The port of Jidda, Red Sea gateway to hidden Mecca, sprawls over hot, treeless hills—whitewashed, sinister and forbidding, as if loath to give up her long guardianship of Arabia's secrets and isolation.

In Jidda the Arabs will show you a long stone tomb, shaped like an airship's hangar; here, they claim, Eve is buried. Adam and Eve were big people, the Arabs say; Eve was so tall she could hold a grown lion in her lap and stroke it as we stroke a kitten. When you note the size of her tomb you can readily believe she was rather a stalwart dame.

Forty-five miles east of Jidda, poured into the canyons and valleys of a mass of rough hills, lies Mecca itself, the famous holy city of Islam.

In spite of its vast political and religious importance, the town is mean and small, with less than 100,000 Mohammedan souls. It has almost no trade, and it manufactures nothing. But it has the largest tourist traffic of any city on earth, and, like other tourist towns, it lives on the traveler.

The Meccans peddle food and clothing to the pilgrims, rent them houses, act as guides, make contracts for transporting pilgrims by land and sea, and in a hundred other ways they craftily exploit (to their own personal benefit) the vast benefactions that flow to the holy city. Even temporary marriages are arranged for the visiting pilgrims.

And the country Arabs, or Bedouins, likewise thrive on the bounty of the pilgrim, either by outright robbery and pillage of the caravans or by imposing taxes, for "protection," on those who pass through their tribal regions.

Meccans of Evil Repute.

But even among the Bedouins the Meccans have a bad reputation. They say the worst birth certificate an Arab can have is the Tashrif, three parallel dashes, distinguishing the bearer as one born in Mecca.

Ever since Mohammed purged the Kaaba of early Arab idols and made it the chief sanctuary of Islam, adapting this heathen temple to Moslem worship by the fiction that Gabriel threw the black stone down from heaven to Abraham, "the unspokeable views of Mecca have been a scandal to all Islam and a constant source of wonder to pious pilgrims."

The modern Arab has so lost his place in the world that he forgets his race once ruled from the Indus to the Atlantic, and that his schools of philosophy, medicine and other sciences were world famous.

In appearance the Arab is singularly handsome, tall and lithe, with beautifully molded limbs, dark-eyed and dark-haired. Dwarfs, hunchbacks, and misshapen persons are seldom seen in Arabia. Hereditary disease, too, is almost unknown, and the race is generally strong and healthy. The Arab's personal habits are simple and clean, the caravans of those born in Mecca being apparently an exception.

Bedouins Are Rovers.

Few races excel the Arabs, either physically or morally. And mentally they are perhaps second to none, especially in alertness of perception, deductive powers, and feats of memory.

Like some other people of the East, however, they seem to lack the powers of organized effort and combined action, a defect which may have tended to keep them so long a subject race.

The origin of the race is a matter of conjecture, but the Arabs were a unified political body with a king of their own long, long before the Christian era. Just now there are perhaps 10,000,000 Arabs, and for convenience of classification they are usually separated into two divisions—"Al Bedouin," or "The Dwellers in the Open Land" (commonly called Bedouins), and "Al Hadr," or "Dwellers in Fixed Localities."

The Bedouins, roaming with their herds all over Arabia and even up into Mesopotamia and Syria, are better known to American missionaries, officials and travelers than the Hadr class. They are nomads from necessity and not from choice, and, as the country comes under better rule, roads, trade and irrigation will undoubtedly reduce the number of Arabs forced to lead this wandering life.

Most of present-day Arabia (that part which is not wholly a desert) is so dry as to be unsuited for anything except grazing; and moisture is so scant that even many of the grazing areas fall from time to time, and the Arabs have to move their herds from place to place, or all would perish. It is this constant quest for grass and water which so often causes friction and fighting among the roving tribes.

Then, too, living this free, open life, so remote from law courts and police, through so many generations, has made the Arabs a bold, defiant, headstrong people, not easily ruled and impatient of restraint. They are familiar with only one quick way to settle a dispute—to fight.

Although Bedouin and bandit are almost synonymous terms in some parts of Arabia, this is hardly fair to the Bedouins when we consider the way they have to live. When they hold up a Meccan caravan, for example, and exact a sum

GOOSE FINDS OLD FRIENDS

TRUE friends are among life's greatest blessings. This would be a very dull world indeed if we had no friends. It is about bedtime when you are far from home and perhaps a little lonely and meet unexpectedly with an old friend you will know just how Honker the Goose felt that day when he reached the Green Meadows and the Green Forest, bringing the message that Jack Frost and Rough Brother North Wind were on their way from the frozen lands of the Far North.

All day from very early in the morning Honker on great strong wings had led his tribe high up in the blue, blue sky straight down from the North. All day long he had cried his message. "Honk, honk, honk, honk, honk,

"I'm So Glad I Happened to Spy Your Little Pond, Paddy."

"Honk!" that all the people on the earth far below might know that it was indeed time to make ready for winter. By the time he reached the Green Meadows where Peter Rabbit was watching and listening for him, as he had been doing for many days, Honker was very, very tired. It was late in the afternoon, and he had flown a great distance. Looking down he could see spread out under him the Green Meadows and the Green Forest. He could see the Smiling Pool, the Laughing Brook, and in the distance the Great River.

He was so tired that he felt that he must find a place to spend the night, a place where he and his followers would be safe from all harm. At first he thought he would lead the way down to the broad bosom of the Great River, but he could see boats going back and forth on it, and so he gave this up. Then his keen eyes spied a glimmer of water deep in the Green Forest. All around it for a long way in every direction the trees of the Green Forest grew close together so that the little pond, for that is what it was, was shut in by the Green Forest. It was a lonesome looking place. That is, it would have looked lonesome to you or to me. But to Honker it did not look lonesome at all. It looked just quiet and safe—a place where there would be no danger from hunters with terrible guns.

Honker turned and led his followers down, down from high up in the blue, blue sky until they were just above the tops of the trees of the Green Forest. Twice over the little pond he led them, his keen eyes searching along the shores for hidden danger. Then, sure that all was safe, he led them down until with splash after splash they had landed on the water in the very middle of the little pond. There they sat for a time, not going near the shore until Honker was absolutely sure that all was well and safe.

Presently Honker's eyes brightened and he swam straight toward a great mound of sticks and turf and mud well out in the water. It was the house of Paddy the Beaver, for this was Paddy's own pond, the one he had made by building a dam across the Laughing Brook.

"Welcome, Honker!" cried a voice. It was the voice of Paddy himself, and he was swimming out to meet Honker.

"Well, well, well!" exclaimed Honker delightedly. "What under the sun are you doing here, Paddy. You are the last person in the world I expected to find here."

"Oh," replied Paddy, "I started out to see the Great World, and came down here from the Great Woods. I like it so well that I made this pond. What do you think of it?"

"Splendid! Splendid!" exclaimed Honker. "Are any other of my old friends around here?"

"I'm here," grinned a voice. Honker looked over to the edge of the pond. There on an old log sat Prickly Porky the Porcupine grinning as pleasantly as he knew how.

"And I'm here," cried a great grumbly-rumbly voice. It was the voice of Buster Bear, who had just come out on the end of Paddy's dam. "Just to think that I should find three old friends from the Great Woods here where I didn't expect to find anyone!" exclaimed Honker happily. "I'm so glad I happened to spy your little pond, Paddy."

"So am I," replied Paddy. (© by J. G. Lloyd.)—WNU Service.

"CROW'S FEET"

WE ARE all familiar with the expression "crow's feet." Let us hope that not so many of us know them personally.

Those fine lines in the corners of the eyes have contributed to the building up of what has become a prominent industry, and just as prominent a profession—the manufacture of cosmetics—and the beautician.

However, our province is not that of an industrial or professional survey, but rather it is to point out the reason d'être of the expression itself which has been with us for at least four or five centuries and which is itself rooted in the resemblance of these tiny wrinkles to the feet of crows.

One of the earliest recorded uses in this connection is by Chaucer in his work Troilus, Vol. 2, page 854. (© 1931, Bell Syndicate.)—WNU Service.

THE WHY OF SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

A RABBIT'S FOOT

THE superstition that a rabbit's foot brings good luck is a very widespread one. Occult authorities say that it must be the left hind foot of a rabbit, killed by a negro in a country graveyard in the dark of the moon. In this we have a superstition clearly descending through centuries and nations from the ancient worship of the Egyptians, among whom the hare-headed god—hares and rabbits are of the same genus—was the guardian of one of the divisions of the Under World. Here we get the idea of darkness and the graveyard. The Egyptians were a very dark people and sometimes statues and pictures of their gods were painted almost black. Hence the idea of a negro.

The rabbit-headed god, besides his job in the Under World, was one powerful for good among the Egyptian deities. Some have identified him with Osiris, "the principle of good and the foe of evil." The connection between this and the idea of a rabbit's foot being a bringer of luck and an amulet against evil is obvious. (© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.) (WNU Service.)

My Neighbor Says:

DO NOT wash berries before putting them into the ice box. The additional moisture in ice box is likely to cause berries to mold.

To keep apples through the winter, bore holes in the bottom and sides of a barrel and store on a dry platform a foot or more from the ground. Where only a few apples are available for storage, a good plan is to carefully wrap them singly in paper, then pack them in layers three or four deep in shallow boxes and place them in the coolest position in the house or outbuilding.

When tea is spilled on a tablecloth cover the stain at once with common salt. Leave for a little while, and when the cloth is washed all stains will have disappeared. (Copyright.)—WNU Service.

Pursuing the "Redcoats"

MINUTE MEN'S DAY OF GLORY

The Minute Men Pursuing the "British Redcoats" Across the Old North Bridge at Concord, Mass., During the Re-enactment of the First Episode of the Revolutionary War, Before 20,000 Persons, as Part of the Massachusetts Tercentenary Celebration.

Paul Revere's Midnight Ride

Revere is the name of Paul Revere. But listen, my children, and you shall hear the truth about that midnight ride that roused every man in the country.

So the immortal Longfellow might have commenced his historic poem and gone on to relate that the lanterns were hung in the North church tower only to warn the Charlestown committee of safety, so that in case Revere were captured crossing the Charles river from Boston, other messengers might be sent from Charlestown. For, it would appear, Revere knew the intention of the British even before he crossed the river.

In Revere's own words (a letter to Rev. Jeremy Belknap, dated January 1, 1778, and published by the Old South Association, Boston): "The Sunday before, by desire of Dr. Warren, I had been to Lexington, to Messrs. Hancock and Adams, who were at the Rev. Mr. Clark's. I returned at night through Charlestown; there I agreed with a Colonel Conant & some other gentlemen, that if the British went out by water, we would show two lanterns in the North Church steeple; and if by land, one, as a signal; for we were apprehensive it would be difficult to cross the Charles River, or get over Boston Neck."

Revere at Medford. But two friends rowed Revere across the river, past the British mill of war, Somerset, and successfully landed him. After he got going on his horse and had evaded two British sentinels, he made for Medford where, he says, "I awakened the captain of the Minute Men; and after that, I alarmed almost every house, till I got to Lexington." There he found Messrs. Hancock and Adams and told them it was believed the British soldiers were either on their way to Lexington to take them prisoner or bent for Concord for the purpose of destroying the Colonists' store of guns and munitions.

But another messenger had been dispatched by Doctor Warren before Revere left Boston. William Dawes had gone by the longer land route, via Boston Neck to Lexington, through Roxbury and Cambridge. At the time there were no bridges from Boston to the towns on the other side of the Charles river. Dawes reached Lexington about a half hour after Revere. Setting out together for Concord, the two messengers met a young Dr. Samuel Prescott who agreed to accompany them and help spread the alarm among the people, many of whom he knew. But halfway to their destination the trio were held up by mounted British officers and forced off the road into a pasture. Again, in Revere's own words, "Doctor Prescott jumped his horse over a low stone wall, and got to Concord." Dawes also escaped and reached Concord soon after the doctor.

Back in Lexington. Revere, however, was questioned thoroughly by the British officers and conducted back to Lexington, where his captors, alarmed by the firing of a volley of guns, released Revere and rode off with his horse.

Then Revere for the second time that night sought out Hancock and Adams, told them what had happened and helped Hancock's secretary, a Mr. Lowell, carry a trunk of papers from the tavern to another house whither Hancock and Adams had fled. After Revere and Lowell had passed through our militia, numbering some fifty or sixty, "who were on a green behind the Meetinghouse," they saw the redcoats appear and heard the first shot fired by the British. Then volleys of shots, and the first battle of the Revolution was on.

So when Longfellow wrote: "It was two by the village clock when he (Revere) came by bridge in Concord town," the great poet juggled the facts somewhat, for Revere didn't go to Concord on that trip.

Nevertheless, Paul Revere performed a great service to the future United States of America that memorable night of April 18-19, 1775. And he, no doubt, inspired his companions, Dawes and Prescott, who were, perhaps, luckier than he in completing the ride from Lexington to Concord.

John Stark

Revolutionary Hero Who Won Commendation of Washington.

Gen. John Stark, hero of Bennington, Bunker Hill and Freedom, was one of the outstanding figures of the Revolutionary war. Washington had implicit faith in his patriotism and ability. His soldiers loved him and would wade through anything if he gave the command. And New Hampshire has always looked upon him with deep pride as one of her most distinguished sons, and ideal soldier and citizen.

At Bennington he had 1,750 men in his command. He was opposed by a force of veterans under Colonel Baum, a man of military skill and experience, who had a battery posted upon a commanding position. Stark had no cannon and scarcely any bayonets. The battle was fought several miles from Bennington, on New York soil. It lasted two hours and resulted in the complete rout of the British with a loss of 207 killed, 750 captured and an unknown number wounded. Four cannon and much other equipment were taken by the Americans, who lost thirty killed and forty wounded.

As showing the importance of this battle, Washington said, on hearing the news: "One more such stroke and we shall have no great cause for anxiety as to the future designs of Britain." The "one more stroke" came sooner than he expected—the surrender of Burgoyne.

Stark fought in the battle of Springfield, N. J., in 1780. He was a member of the tribunal that tried and convicted Major Andre as a spy. Washington sent him with twenty-five hundred troops to surprise the British on Staten Island. He was given charge of the northern department, with headquarters at Fort Mifflin, and while there learned of the surrender of Cornwallis. In 1783 he was ordered to headquarters by Washington, and received the warm personal thanks of the commander in chief. He was given the rank of major general by brevet.

He returned home and resumed farming and saw milling. He lived forty-five years after the battle of Bennington, surviving all officers of equal rank in the American army.

He was the father of eleven children, five sons and six daughters. He lived until he was ninety-four years old, dying May 8, 1852.

Bank of North America Given Odd Prerogative

There were a few banks during Colonial times, but no commercial banks as we know them. One of the earliest is said to have been established in South Carolina in 1680 for the convenience of a group of planters. Not much is known of this bank and it did not long survive, but William Patterson, who afterward promoted the bank of England, is said to have investigated it. In 1680 a number of citizens of Boston united to establish a bank of issue, in disregard of the British laws.

But largely because there was not a stable monetary system there was little banking done in this country prior to the adoption of the Constitution in 1787. On July 17, 1789, an institution called the Pennsylvania bank opened in Philadelphia, supported by about a hundred subscribers and intended chiefly to assist in procuring supplies for Washington's troops. This bank, formed at the instance of Thomas Paine, continued only about a year and a half, after which the special need for it had lapsed.

The first modern commercial bank in this country was the bank of North America, in which Robert Morris was a leading figure, and which was organized November 1, 1781, and opened its doors on January 7, 1782. In 1864 it entered the national banking system. In view of its history and traditions, it alone among national banks was not required to include the word "National" in its name. According to Folk's Bankers' Encyclopedia, issue of March, 1931, there are 6,994 national banks in the country, 16,049 state and trust companies, and 535 private banks.

Ant a Constant Puzzle to Students of Nature

The ant presents an inexhaustible wealth of delight. Should one have longed to live in the midst of a primitive society, he may literally find one in the pomegranate ants of the northwestern corner of the damp, sun-drenched soil of our deep woods, and shimmers of light.

They live their lives entirely under ground, writes C. Parker Haskins in Nature Magazine of Washington, save for the flying queens and males. They may be seen in midsummer, near cautiously warming their young under the coolest and dampest of stones. While the larvae lie neglected in the brood chamber, the queens work as do the workers, for the colonies may number but ten or a dozen individuals all told. The members fight among themselves for the spoil scattered half dissected on the floor, as the first humans fought in the early day of man's existence.

The ant offers a wealth of sociological, ethnological and biological problems. What is the de which blinds the advanced ant guest or pet—a vicious parasite in attractive garb—to its host, and enables it to exploit every instinct of its benefactor, while destroying the very brood of its host?

What is the marvelous instinct whereby a parasitic young queen may persuade the workers of the host species to assassinate their own queen in her favor? At what time—certainly in prehistoric years—did the true ant first split from the stock of its mysterious, subterranean wasplike ancestor? How did the ant first come to America, supposing it to have originated to the eastward?

Fifty Years Unwashed

A well-known Norfolk hermit, Edwin Ernest Colman, aged seventy-eight, was found dead at Gissing, near Diss (England), with a bruise on the head. He was turned out of two homes and an effort was made to evict him from a shed in which he took refuge. As the result of a public petition, however, he was allowed to remain. A whilst drive was held, and with the proceeds and donations Colman's shed was remodeled and he had since lived peacefully there, looking after his poultry. It is reported that he had not undressed for years and had not washed for 50 years.

Dynamite Center

Elkhart, Kan., is the dynamite center of southwest Kansas because of its unique allowance of explosive within the city limits. Nearby towns forbid the unloading of dynamite, but this city has no such ban and consequently is the basis of operation within a large radius. Shipping contracts require that the transportation company remove the product to a safe distance and explode it if customers fail to claim it within 48 hours.—Indianapolis News.

Baby Whales Hatched

For the first time, writes a correspondent of the London Sunday Observer, the Budapest zoo has been successful in hatching whale eggs in an incubator. The four baby fish which appeared are dispirited; them selves merrily in a small stretch of water.

As Hungary's only considerable lake, the Balaton, would scarcely be large enough to harbor four grown whales as well as its yachting societies, it is presumed that the whales will be sold, like the baby hippopotamus born at London last year, before they reach an inconvenient size.

ALFRED HOGSTON ISSUES STATEMENT ABOUT FIRES

Alfred Hogston, State Fire Marshal, has issued the semi-annual report of the activities of the State Fire Marshal Department.

During the months of January to June, inclusive, of this year, the Arson Division investigated 178 fires of suspicious origin, re-investigated 11 and has 8 cases waiting further attention. This is a considerable increase over the first six months of 1930, when the Arson Division investigated 115 fires.

Thirty-one of these suspicious fires were rural and 21 were barns. In nearly every instance where the fire was "set" it was the greatly over-insured barn that was the object.

Five of these cases were automobile fires, and 2 of them were proven incendiary.

There were 30 arrests during this period. Of these, 23 confessed and 7 were bound over to the Grand Jury. Fourteen of those who confessed were sentenced and are now serving prison terms. Nine were given suspended sentences, leniency having been suggested by the Department although the final disposition of the cases was left entirely to the presiding Court. The other 7 were bound over to the Grand Jury.

Nineteen convictions for the first half of the year show a decided increase over those for the same period of 1930, when 8 convictions were secured.

Mr. Hogston stated, "The fact that the number of suspicious fires has increased within the last year indicate that the arsonist is more active. However, while the activities of the incendiary has been greater than last year, a larger per cent of them have been caught and sentenced. This would indicate that this brand of criminal is bolder and willing to take greater risks of apprehension and conviction than a year ago."

Mr. and Mrs. James Reed were Sunday evening guests at the Roy Bowser home in St. Joe.

Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Whitacre went Monday morning for a few days visit at the Earl Whitacre home near Harlan.

The Young Lady's Social Club will hold a masquerade party at the home of Miss Alein Rhodes on Friday evening.

Miss Jessie Maurer, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Roy Maurer and Walter Dwyer of east of town were married on Sunday evening at the Methodist parsonage by the Rev. Homer Studabaker. The young people will make their home at present with the bride's parents.

Mr. and Mrs. Lee Burgett and children, Gladys Long and Albert Love were Sunday dinner guests of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Miller west of town.

Mr. and Mrs. Wilbur Spencer and family of Fort Wayne spent Sunday afternoon with Mr. and Mrs. John Betz. Saturday evening callers were Mr. and Mrs. Earl McNabb and family of Auburn.

Chinch bugs are reported as active in Allen county and the pests are now leaving small grains and making their way to corn fields. The bugs cover the stalk and suck the juices out, causing the corn to die quickly. A dust barrier is about the only preventive. Plow around the field and work dirt into a dust.

Monday, the 13th, Mr. and Mrs. John Ulm, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Akins, Mr. M. E. Foltz and sons from Cleveland, O., and Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Buckingham enjoyed a picnic dinner in the grove. The occasion being J. P.'s birthday. Mrs. Akins presented him with a beautiful cake. On returning late in the evening Dr. and Mrs. Shook and Miss Evelyn surprised both Mr. and Mrs. Buckingham by bringing an ice cream freezer full of delicious home made ice cream, having previously invited several friends in to help make the best of it. ## ED MISER MOVES FAMILY TO GARRETT

After thirteen years as manager of the Standard Oil Company bulk plant, E. N. Miser was moved by the company to Garrett, where the work is less strenuous and he will have one truck.

We understand that he will service Garrett with but little country driving.

At St. Joe two trucks were used and the territory was quite extensive.

Mr. Miser will be missed in St. Joe as he always supported its undertakings liberally and maintained a public spirit.

The new manager, Roy Ridenbach of Kendallville, who for 3 years has managed the Standard Service Station there, is on the job, and he will move his family to St. Joe within a week and occupy the Miser home.

Besides Mrs. Ridenbach the family is composed of two daughters, aged 6 and 11 years, and The News extends to the new residents a hearty welcome.

Mr. Paul Furnish will continue to drive one truck. He has worked out of the local station for the past two years.

BEAR CREEK BRIDGE ABOUT COMPLETED

Contractor Merritt Butler and his gang of men will complete the Bear Creek bridge east of town this week, and as soon as the short strip of pavement on each side is dry, traffic will again be able to come from the east.

The work has been slow, due to having to tear out and build up, all of which is a slow process, and especially when it comes to remodeling heavy cement work.

The bridge will present a beautiful appearance to the road and the class of work done, will also reflect much credit to the contractor.

HIGHWAY QUARANTINE STATIONS OPENED MONDAY

Early maturity of the sweet corn in parts of the area under state and federal quarantine for the European corn borer has made it necessary to begin inspection of vehicles several days sooner than last year, and the highway stations at which they are stopped were established Monday, July 20.

At these stations, located on roads leading from the quarantined area, all vehicles are halted by inspectors in uniform, who explain the quarantines and ascertain if prohibited articles are carried. Corn on the cob may not be taken from within the infested area to points outside.

Spread of the pest by artificial means is prevented through the restrictions on the movement of corn which may be infested, the quarantine officials state.

The territory in the west under quarantine on account of the borer includes most of Ohio, all of Michigan and part of Indiana.

Vehicle inspection will be continued for from sixty to ninety days.

ST. JOE GIRL COMPLETES RE- QUIREMENTS FOR TEACHERS LICENSE AT BUTLER

Miss Martha Miser of St. Joe, Ind., is one of the forty-four students in the Butler University college of education who completed their requirements toward a teacher's license at the close of the first summer term on Friday, July 17. Miss Miser was awarded a certificate by Dean W. L. Richardson which represented the successful completion of the two years teacher's training course prescribed by the state law.

By being graduated from the Butler college of education Miss Miser is now eligible to teach elementary grade subjects in Indiana. The summer term is annually scheduled at the university for those students who do not complete their work in time for the spring commencement exercises and also for active school teachers who were unable to attend the winter session.

Miss Miser has been officially enrolled as a member of the 1931 graduating class of the university.

REV. MAYFIELD TO TAKE VACATION

Due to ill health, Rev. B. W. Mayfield, stated before the Quarterly Conference at Concord, Monday night that he would not take work next year in the M. P. Conference, and that his decision would necessitate the change in pastor for the next year.

The quarterly conference reports were made by the different church officers, but the delegate to the annual conference, together with vote on pastor and salary was not fully decided upon.

DEKALB COUNTY TEACHERS INSTITUTE SEPT. 1, 2, 3

The DeKalb County Teachers Institute will be held September 1, 2 and 3 in the court house assembly room in Auburn. Among the speakers already secured by Carl F. Stallman, county superintendent, is Louis Ludlow of Indianapolis, a well known Washington newspaper correspondent who will make an address the first day. Dr. Paul F. Voelker, president of Battle Creek college, is another speaker. He will be on the program September 1 and 2.

INDIANA WHEAT GROWERS FAIRING BETTER THAN WESTERN FARMERS

Wheat threshing in Indiana is now getting into full swing and during the next ten days millions of bushels of golden grain will be harvested in the state. Deliveries to elevator points of the Central States Grain Association indicate that 75 to 80 per cent of the wheat being threshed will be retained in bins on the farms.

Prices to the Indiana farmer have been ranging from 36 to 40 cents per bushel according to freight rate zones. Although these prices seem to be ruinously low, information comes from reliable sources that farmers in western Nebraska are receiving only 18 cents per bushel for their wheat and growers in southern and western South Dakota are getting as low as 12 cents.

The wheat being held on the farms in Indiana will be used mostly for livestock feeding purposes. In some cases, farmers are holding their wheat expecting to be offered a better price for it later in the year and others are holding it pending the outcome of the corn crop. Although present conditions of the corn crop are good, it is not unlikely that a continuance of extremely hot weather may damage it considerably because of there being but little sub-soil moisture in the ground.

JERSEY CATTLE CLUB MEET

The Directors of the DeKalb County Jersey Club met Friday evening in the office of the County Agent, E. R. Myers, and discussed plans for the District Parish Show and the County Show.

It was decided to hold the County Show on Old Settler's Day August 13th. The Jersey Cattle Club will show their calves on the same day. Mr. T. M. Ice, an official in the State Jersey Cattle Club, will be the Judge.

The success of the County Show and the possibility of entering the District Parish Show will depend on the cooperation of the Jersey Cattle Breeders in DeKalb County.

Hamilton Lake is reported to have raised 7 inches Sunday, due to the heavy down pour of rain.

WILMOT

George C., son of George and Lucia Wilmot, was born July 26, 1866 at St. Joe, Indiana and departed this life at the Methodist hospital in Fort Wayne, Indiana, July 14, 1931, at the age of 64 years, 11 months and 14 days.

Although he was not in the best of health, he was able to continue his work as usual. Thus we are again brought face to face with the fact of how insecure is our hold on life.

He was united in marriage to Miss Jennie Gibbons on September 12, 1895. To this union were born six children. Two of whom have preceded him to that better land. Surviving are the wife, Jennie; four daughters, Mrs. Victoria Means of Spencerville; Mrs. Gladys Chester of Harlan; Mrs. Opal Belcer and Mrs. Dorothy Hinsley, both of Fort Wayne; four brothers, Ella and Arthur Wilmot, both of St. Joe; Plin of Manton, Ohio; and Vernon Wilmot of Fort Wayne; ten grandchildren and many friends and neighbors.

He was a member of the Pilgrim Holiness Church and his manner as husband, father and friend expressed the kind of character that he possessed.

He was a faithful husband and a loving father and will be greatly missed by those that survive him.

The funeral was held at Harlan Friday afternoon from the M. P. Church, Rev. J. N. Scholes of St. Joe, officiating. Burial in Scipio cemetery.

CARD OF THANKS

We desire in this manner to express to our many friends and neighbors who so kindly administered to us with their words and deeds of kindness in this our bereavement, and also for the floral offerings.

Mrs. Wilmot and Children.

He was united in marriage to Letitia Bowman of Spencerville, March 15, 1896. To this union were born seven children, Clarence, Walter, Mary, Evelyn, Lloyd, Albert and Donald, all of whom survive with the exception of the youngest, Donald, having passed on before his mother.

He leaves to mourn their loss six children, six grandchildren, two brothers, Martin and LeRoy White of St. Joe and one sister, Mrs. Ella Gill of St. Joe.

Funeral services were held from the home Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, the Rev. A. K. Mumma officiating. Burial in St. Joe cemetery, by Roscoe Walter.

KEYES

Emma Tyndall-Keyes was born February 21, 1858 and departed this life July 19, 1931, at the age of 73 years, 4 months and 28 days. She had been afflicted with heart trouble for several years.

Her first husband, Mr. Allen, died at the age of 34 years, and was the father of three children, two of which died in infancy, and William, being the only survivor of this union. A brother, W. S. Tyndall of Spencerville and several grandchildren remain.

For a few years she resided in Ft. Wayne, becoming the wife of Jayson Keyes, and since his death two years ago in Spencerville, she had been making her home with her son, Will and family.

The funeral was held from the M. E. Church Tuesday afternoon conducted by Rev. Homer Studabaker, with burial in White City cemetery.

EXAMPLE

Every man has some power over others that is exercised without conscious effort on his part. It is a responsibility he cannot dodge. If he is a strong man, others will strive to emulate his strength. If he is a weak man, others, in passing, will shudder at the thought of being like him. Both serve the noble cause of uplift.

In almost every group, organization or community there is one man who walks his chosen way without thoughts for the preferences, opinions and will of others. He is a strong man; original, dominant, cocksure. If he has looked the world over and decided against it; if it is his custom to attribute the worst possible motives to all men; if he is, in short, a cynic, those who come within his influence are most certain to find themselves sneering at mankind and calling the world a failure.

But if this strong man is conservative with a well lined nest and a conviction that all who advocate change or a disturbing of dividends are dangerous cranks who should be jailed or deported, those who associate with him soon learn to use his pet phrases in denunciation of dreamers and to feel a certain awe of money in large piles.

Therefore, since it is a certainty that the average man, who lacks a dominating personality, will be remade after the image of the strong men within whose orbit he roves, why shouldn't he exercise what little discretion he has in the matter and attach himself to men who now are what he would like to be.

LIGHTS OF NEW YORK

By WALTER TRUMBULL

There are many brownstone houses still left on the side streets of New York. Now that daylight savings comes us long twilight hours after the work of the day is over, you see the high steps leading up to the doors of these houses covered with the inhabitants, just as you might see persons sitting on the front steps in any little town. Not only the streets but the roofs are rest or play areas in summer. I am not talking of penthouse roofs, but just of the ordinary roofs of buildings.

Looking down from an upper window of any of the tall buildings, you can see children playing on the flat roofs, while some older member of the family sits, usually in a rocking chair, watching them. Some of these watchers have rigged sunshades for themselves. When the weather grows really hot, those roofs will have cots or mattresses on them and their owners will be sleeping as near to the stars as they can get.

Among the attractive owners of an attractive apartment in New York are the Messmore Kendalls. They live over the Capitol theater and a door of their apartment opens into a private box from which they can see any performance, while themselves unseen. Florence Ziegfeld has somewhat the same arrangement in his theater, the box in this case being hung like a bird cage against a door, which opens from his offices. Many of the producers who own theaters in New York have a somewhat similar arrangement. But that has practically nothing to do with the story I heard recently.

It starts with the fact that the Messmore Kendalls gave a dinner and that among their guests were the Count and Countess von Luckner. That furnishes the cast. Now for the plot. New York has so many telephones that it has become necessary to issue the telephone books in sections. In other words, there is a book for Manhattan, one for Brooklyn, one for the Bronx, and several others. The company sends you the ones you appear most likely to use and the others are furnished on request. Mrs. Kendall had, for some reason, experienced considerable difficulty in getting one book, but had finally obtained it. Now it seems that when the dinner was over and only the men were left at the table, the conversation turned to the fact of strength. Count von Luckner is very big, very likable, and very strong. In discussing such facts as tearing packs of cards and other things in two, he offered to illustrate his point, and material was furnished for the demonstration. When Mrs. Kendall next saw her prized telephone papers carry stories of the thousands who will be benefited but they rarely mention the few who may be crushed by the wheels of progress. There are, for example, two women who have been running a newstand for many years. It has furnished them with a decent livelihood, perhaps clothed and educated their children. Recently those women have been looking worried and forlorn. The opening of a new subway has diverted traffic from their stand and it looks as if they might have to give it up.

Women are much more particular about their hairdressers than men are about their barbers. So long as a man doesn't get the old country hovel haircut, he is pretty well satisfied, but there appear to be dozens of ways of cutting and fixing a woman's hair. I book, it was torn neatly in four pieces.

When New York opens a new subway, the mayor usually drives the first train through it and there are speeches and a general celebration in which the officials of the company and citizens' committee take part. News-have known women to come back to town in summer from places which were an over-night trip, just to have their hair done by the latest accoutrements. At the present time, my wife is disconsolate because her favorite hairdresser, Pierre, is moving to Cleveland. (© 1931, Bell Syndicate)—WNU Service.

The KITCHEN CABINET

FOOD FOR THE FUSSY

There are grown-ups who are fussy about their food, but sometimes they are hopeless; however, with children a firm hand and eternal vigilance will accomplish wonders. Children are naturally imaginative and keenly enjoy a fairy tale, no matter what it is about. Why not use this method in teaching him to eat the things he should. Every woman should be a good story teller, able to picture interesting things out of the ordinary. With really ill people in bed, one may use about the same story for even grown ups, they get pleasure out of the things that the child will, if presented in a whimsical manner.

Floating Island.—This old-fashioned dish of our grandmother's day will never go out of style, for it is so wholesome and good as well as pretty. To prepare the custard take three eggs yolk, four tablespoons of sugar, a pinch of salt, one and one-half cups of scalded milk and when cooked until it coats the spoon add one-half teaspoonful of vanilla to flavor. For the island, beat the whites of the eggs until stiff, add four tablespoons of sugar and drop by spoonfuls on hot water in a shallow pan. Cook until firm or set in the oven to brown. Remove the islands to the custard, chill and serve. Our grandmothers used to cook the egg white on top of the custard while it was cooking, thus they conserved time and heat.

A dish of floating island, so good for children who will not eat custards and refuse milk, may be presented in a glass dish with the cooked white of eggs on top. It may be a treasure island, an iceberg with a "hut" to be rescued or a raider will do. If it is not real enough make legs and arms of cloves, a head of a large clove. The rescuer will eat his way to being a hero.

"BAD CESS TO YOU!"

HERE is an idiom exclusively Irish in nativity and which is understood to mean "May ill luck attend you!"

While this expression bears all the earmarks of an imprecation of curse, it really sounds much worse than it connotes today, its usage being quite similar to our, "Oh, go to the devil!" As already indicated, the line is Irish in origin, "cess" being the Gaelic for "board and lodging!" (© 1931, Bell Syndicate)—WNU Service.

Hanako's Holiday

Little Hanako Tanaka opened her eyes slowly. She raised her black head from the wooden pillow and stared at the sunlight coming through the paper walls.

She rolled quickly out of bed, which was made of soft quilts piled on the floor. She put on her gayest, brightest kimono with big red flowers on it, her white stockings which had places made for the big toes, and she slipped her feet into her red sandals.

"Good morning, little one," said a gentle voice as her mother came into the room. "We are glad that honorable sun most kindly shines upon this great day of dolls." Mrs. Tanaka pushed back the sliding walls and let the sunshine and the playful breezes of March pour into the room.

"Now may we have the beautiful steps?" Hanako asked after she had eaten her breakfast. She watched eagerly as her mother took out of a big chest five steps covered with red silk. At the top of the steps she placed a dazzling golden screen.

"Here come most honorable emperors and empress," said Hanako, taking two dolls from her mother's hand. Hanako placed each royal doll on the top step in front of the golden screen.

"Next come the ladies-in-waiting," said Hanako. She arranged the three dolls in their bright kimonos on the step below the royal family.

"Here are the orange and cherry trees which are like the trees at the gate of the royal palace," said her mother.

Hanako put the gay little trees at each end of the third step, with a royal sentinel beside them. In between them she placed the court musicians who were seated cross-legged on soft cushions.

"Now we prepare the fourth step," counted Hanako with a happy smile. For a whole year she had waited to see again all these beautiful dolls, for these were the special dolls which were used only on the day of the Doll Festival, when every little Japanese girl had a holiday.

Later the boys would have their holiday, when queer paper fishes would fly from tall poles and the boys would fly kites and have kite races.

"We now greet the three coolie dolls," said Hanako as she placed them on the fourth step. There were hot soaps which every one drank, and blue and white bowls full of rice. There was golden brown fish served with preserved apricots, green chrysanthemum leaves in yellow batter, and bamboo shoots and mushrooms dipped in custard, and of course every one used chopsticks.

After dinner Hanako went visiting other little girls all up and down the street, and she carried gifts for them in her kimono sleeves.

"Alas, the smiling sun is going far away," said Hanako, as the third day of March ended. "The most beautiful dolls must go again into the big chest. Of all Doll Festivals this has been best." She cuddled down into her quilt.

My Neighbor Says:

TO RESTORE faded upholstery, beat the dust out, then brush. Apply a strong lather of castile soap with a hard brush, wash off with clear water, then wash off with alum water. On becoming dry, the colors will look as well as ever. When the colors are faded beyond recovery they may be touched up with a pencil dipped in water colors of suitable shade, mixed with gum water.

If you want candles to last half as long again as usual, try the following plan: Take each candle by the wick and give it a good coating of white varnish. Then put the candles away for a day or two to harden. The varnish prevents the grease from running down, and so preserves the life of the candle.

If the surface of your stove looks rough, it is probably due to an accumulation of stove blacking. Sandpaper rubbed over the surface will make it as smooth as when new. (Copyright)—WNU Service.

How to Build Your Fortress

1. A soft wood box about 19 inches by 13 inches is used for the main part, and a similar one is cut up for the turrets at the four corners.
2. Tools you will need are: a coping saw, chisel, a small cross-cut saw, plane, hammer, assorted nails, sharp knife, a pencil and ruler.
3. Pieces are cut in the parapet, with coping saw and knife and are 1 inch long and 3/4 inch high.
4. The platforms inside turrets, for soldiers to stand on, are 2 inches down from the top. Small ladders can reach from the floor to platforms.

5. Two doors, each 2 inches wide by 4 inches inward.

Huge Cooking Utensils

of Pioneer Households

Cooking vessels of long ago bear silent testimony to the largeness of the pioneer family. Apple butter was made in a copper kettle as big as a tub and stirred with a rough, unappetizing paddle with holes in it.

Wooden sausage mills, turned by a crude crank, make the odds and ends of hogs palatable. Huge copper bread bowls measured two feet in diameter. Some of the Jewish cooking vessels brought over by the first Russian emigrants have been preserved for the edification of modern housewives, accustomed to pigmy pots in pastel colors. The two-tined forks of seventy-five years ago were not used for eating, but for spearing food out of the community pot in the center of the table. As soon as you forked your portion onto your plate, the knife was used for bridging the distance between plate and mouth. Such were the table manners of our best early Indianapolis society.

A shaker, such as the cook uses in the kitchen for dusting powdered sugar on your food, was used by our forefathers for sprinkling sand on letters to dry fresh ink. The wonder of blotting paper, which you take for granted now, was then unknown. Pinkish irons attest that vanity is no modern trait. Efficient housewives of long ago have left behind a number of double spinning wheels that enabled them to take the flax off the wheel with both hands.

All of the interesting objects just described and many others are owned by a local citizen who has spent the last twenty-five years in collecting them. In driving from farmhouse to farmhouse he found innumerable objects tucked away in odd corners which, when displayed together, mutely reconstruct an interesting pioneer environment.—Indianapolis News.

Birds Pay Tribute to Singer's Golden Voice

Ninon Vallin, the French operatic star, is a woman St. Francis, one of her most regular and devoted audiences consisting of hundreds of small birds which come flying to the window of her home in France as soon as she starts singing. They stay perched on the window-sills and even on the piano until she stops. "I have always adored birds," she explained, in very broken English, to a reporter. "When I was little I had a lot of them in cages, but my father hated to see them in captivity. So he let them out in the garden, but instead of flying away, they stayed and used to swarm round me whenever I started to sing." Asked how she first started her career, Madame Vallin replied smilingly, "In church. Some influential people had heard my voice in church, and insisted on my trying first in Lyons, then in Paris, with the result that after singing at a charity performance Da Costa heard me and immediately booked me for a huge tour in South America. Since then," she added laughing, "I have never stopped singing."

The Knife

Dr. Charles H. Mayo, the famous surgeon, said at a luncheon in Rochester:

"Dreiser in one of his novels killed off a woman in childbirth with a Caesarian section operation, and now Hemingway has done the same thing."

"These novelists are evidently of the same mind as the hospital surgeon."

"Doctor," a visitor said to him, "what is the most dangerous case you have here?"
"This," said he, and he laughed and laid his hand on a case of surgical instruments.—Detroit Free Press.

THE STORY

With his English wife, Catherine, and son, Jeems, Henry Bulain, French settler in Canada in 1760, cultivates a farm adjacent to the Tontour seigneurie. As the story opens the Builains are returning from a visit to the Ton-tours. Catherine's wandering brother, Hespithah, meets them with presents for the family. To Jeems he gives a pistol, bidding him perfect himself in marksmanship.
Hespithah fears for the safety of Builains in their isolated position.

CHAPTER III—Continued

Concealing himself behind the bole of a tree, Jeems watched them as they passed, so near that a pebble flung by a hoof of one of the horses fell at his side. His courage almost failed him then, for while his hands clenched at the sight of Paul Tache, his heart faltered in its beating as his attention turned from his enemy to Toinette.
She had become, all at once, a young lady whom he could easily believe he had never seen before, and the change in her held him for a few moments so forgetful of his own existence that he would have been discovered had he not been so intent on her. He glanced in the direction of Toinette, wearing her first riding suit, a gorgeous blue camel trimmed with silver, just arrived from Quebec. With this she wore a smartly cocked beaver hat which bore a russet feather, and from under this hat her long dark hair fell in a cascade of carefully made curls, partly restrained in their freedom by two or three red ribbons enmeshed among them. She was superbly aware of the lovely figure she made, and every inch of her body was at a distinct tension as she rode past the place where Jeems was hidden.

After she had gone, Jeems felt an overwhelming sense of littleness and unimportance. For Toinette was no longer Toinette, but a real princess, grown up. And Paul Tache, riding close beside her, with hair powdered and tied and with a red velvet coat that could be seen a mile away, seemed now to be infinitely removed from the plotting which he had conceived against him. He stepped from behind the tree and stooped to pick up the pebble which Toinette's horse had flung at him. He could hear the succession of her voice, and others bidding Lussan's progress. Then came a burst of laughter which rose with unrestrained abandon above all other sound, a blast of merriment which he would have recognized anywhere in the world. Only his Uncle Hespithah could laugh like that. The sight and exclamations of the scene about him would have made for him one of the most thrilling events of his forest-rimmed world, had his heart not been choked with the emotions of impending drama. Yet he did not press his desires by undue haste, and it was half an hour before he found himself close to the gun. This happened in such a fortuitous way that Toinette, concealed by the ample forms of Lussan's wife and daughter, was within a foot of his shoulder before he knew it.
She did not see him, and he stood with wildly beating heart, breathing the faint perfume from her person, his senses dazed by the nearness of her splendor and his world of vision filled only with a great broad-brimmed hat, an extraordinary mass of lustrous curls, a sunset of crimson ribbons, a pair of slim shoulders—and then, his perspective broken by the ugliness of reality, he discovered Paul Tache. The young man was returning from a journey to the barrens, and when he saw Jeems, a contemptuous smile twisted his lips.
It was this look which turned Toinette so that she found Jeems standing beside her, his cap and a package in his hands, his face tawny red as he fought himself into obliviousness of his rival's presence.

He held out his gift to her.

"My Uncle Hespithah has just come from the English colonies, and he brought me this that I might in turn give it to you. Will you accept it, Toinette?"

He forgot Paul Tache. Spots of red came into his cheeks as Toinette's surprised eyes greeted him. She almost smiled, and as if something made her forgetful of her magnificence and the dignity it imposed, she extended her hand to receive the package. The manner in which she accepted the gift sent the blood racing through his body. The color deepened in his cheeks, and, mistaking this for still greater evidence of the pleasurable thrill he had given her, Jeems was sure she was about to thank him for his gift, when Paul stood beside them.
Ignoring Jeems, Toinette's cousin led her away, politely relieving her of the package as they went. It was then Toinette turned to smile at Jeems, in spite of the eyes she knew were watching her. In this same moment her escort allowed the package to drop surreptitiously from his hand.

This act, inspired by a contempt for the forest boy, and urged by a meanness of spirit hidden under a display of wealth and fine clothes, swept Jeems' thought from Toinette, whose nearness of person, surprising beauty, and sweetness of disposition had almost made him forget his one reason for being at Lussan's sale. This weakness in the armor of his intentions was sealed when he saw his present fall to the ground. Toinette became instantly immaterial in the path of a storm of emotion which caught and held him fiercely. He saw only one person where there were two, and that one was Paul Tache. In a brain white with heat, and in eyes blinded to the presence of all living forms except that of the youth who had darkened his mind with bitterness, Toinette ceased to exist for him, and when he was rescuing it for her, but that it was to be his reason for glorious war when the moment was at hand for him to hurl it in his rival's face.

Detaching themselves from the shifting groups of which they had been part, Toinette and young Tache strode to their horses, and Tache followed their elegant placances. Giving themselves a brief time in which to be admired, they sauntered into the gardens back of Lussan's house.

Jeems was only a few steps from Paul and Toinette when they disappeared behind the house. He held back with a feeling of satisfaction when

He Had Never Fought With Another Boy.

he saw the two going down a path which took them out of sight of any curious eyes that might have watched them. Not until the last flutter of Toinette's skirt was gone did he proceed with the business of following them, and then, like an Indian, he slipped noiselessly along the path and found them standing, somewhat perplexed, at the edge of a boggy and ill-smelling open space where Lussan had built his barn and wherein his cattle and pigs had gathered for so long that one was sure of a precarious and unpleasant footing. Toinette, her chin tilted, a flash of indignation in her eyes as she held up her skirt, with both hands, was on the point of leaving her wrath upon her escort for daring to bring her to such a place of de-clement when Jeems stepped out from a rim of bushes and confronted them.

His face was pale. His slim body was as taut as a bowstring. His eyes were almost black. He did not see Toinette, scarcely knew that she was in his world, even as he saw anger gave place to an exclamation of surprise when she saw in his hand the package which he had given her a few minutes before. He approached Paul Tache, and that youth, misinterpreting the slowness of his movement and the bloodless pallor of his face as signs of embarrassment and fear, sought to cover his disgrace in Toinette's eyes by an explosion of haughty protest at being followed and spied upon in this way. Jeems made no reply except to hold out the package. Sight of it choked the words in the other's throat.
Jeems' silence and the way in which he continued to extend the package brought a deep color into Paul's face.
He and not Jeems was conscious of the amazement in Toinette's countenance and of the intensity of her interest in the situation. He recovered himself swiftly and, with a guttural change of manner, held out his hand.
"Pardon me," he apologized. "It is good of you to bring the package—which I accidentally dropped."

Jeems came a step nearer.
"You lie!" he cried, and with a furious movement he hurled the bundle at Tache's feet.

The force of the blow sent Paul reeling backward, and Jeems was at him with the quickness and passion of one suddenly transformed by madness. He had never fought with another boy. But he knew how animals clawed and disemboweled. In a trun-ded way he had viewed strife and death as the wilderness knew these things. And all that he had withnessed, all that he knew of torture and violence and the desire to maim and kill gave to his action a character of such lively ferocity that it drew a howl of pain from Paul Tache and a shrill little scream from Toinette.

Jeems heard the scream, but it held no significance for him now. His dreams were gone, and Toinette, her presence close to him, her eyes upon the battle just as he had imagined in the thrill of his mental visionings was forgotten in the flesh and blood of his interest in the man and woman of Paul. In the first attack, his fingers clutched like small iron claws in the folds of Tache's cravat and coat, and the rending of cloth, a splitting saunter of gorgeous material almost to the other's waist, was evidence of the strength behind his assault. He followed this with a fury of scratching and tearing and both went down in the melee. When they rose, Paul heaving himself up with an effort which flung Jeems from him, they were such a sight of muck and stain that Toinette forgot her precious dress and covered her eyes in horror.
But she was looking again in an instant, for the spectacle fascinated even as it appalled her. Jeems had landed on his feet with a fist loaded with mud, and this he projected with an aim so accurate that half of Paul's face was obliterated by it, and as he leapt with a roar of rage at his smaller assailant, he was such a shocking contrast to his usual immaculate self that Toinette nearly ceased to breathe. Then she saw and heard what her feminine eyes and instincts could not understand or keep proper count of, a mad twisting and tumbling of bodies, panting breaths, grunts, and finally a clearly audible curse from Paul Tache. With that sound Jeems slew backward and landed on his back.

He was up almost before he had struck, and with his head ducked low like a ram's in a charge, he hurled himself at Tache. This individual, having cleared his eyes sufficiently to perceive the blinding of the other's punch, stepped aside and swung a well-directed blow which again sent Jeems down into the muck. His hand filled itself with this sticky substance a second time, and as he returned to battle he let it fly at Paul. Profiting by experience, Paul dodged skillfully, and the volley passed over his head, and spreading in its flight, and fell in his contaminating violence upon Toinette.
She saw her raiment spotted and defiled, and such a sudden fury rose in her that she sprang upon Jeems as he clawed and kicked in a clinch with Paul, and assailed him with all the strength and bitterness of her small fists and biting tongue.

Jeems had seen the tragedy of the muddled mud, and he knew that Toinette's hands and not Paul's were pulling viciously at his hair. There is a hurt which bears with it a sting of satisfaction, and this emotion pressed upon Jeems as he fought desperately in front and felt himself attacked from behind. For Paul Tache, who was accountable for the mishap to Toinette. Had the other not dodged in a cowardly fashion, allowing the stuff to pass on to her, the thing would not have happened. It did not take more than a few seconds for his inspiration of this thought with its apparent justice and truth to fire him with a determination beside which his former resolution sank to insignificance. He was no longer fighting for Toinette's approval, but against her, against Paul Tache, against all the world. Toinette, pulling at his hair, beating at his back, had raised his struggle to epic heights. The strength of martyrdom filled his lean arms and body, and he fought with a renewed fierceness that made his heavier but softer antagonist give way before the punishment, and both went down to earth again. Toinette fell with them, her long skirt impeding the activity of her legs, her big hat hanging like a smash over her face, her beautifully made curls tangled and spotted with mud, her hands beating angrily at whichever of the two chanced to come in her way.

These Happy Victorians

One entry in the diary of Mary Gladstone (afterward Mrs. Drew), daughter of W. E. Gladstone, "Grand Old Man" of Victorian politics, reads:
"Quiet evening at home. I was in my room at 9:30 and heard him and mamma coming up the stairs singing.
A ragamuffin husband and a ranting wife at the top of their voices."

"Him" was her father, the prime minister of England, then seventy-four years of age. "Home" was No. 10 Downing street, official residence of the P. M.—Kansas City Star.

To Preserve Old Prints

Since old prints of flowers, birds and personages are now so popular for framing, it is also worth while to take suitable modern pictures of prints, perhaps from magazines, and antique them with a light coating of liquid wax. This treatment will give them a mellow, old tone and will preserve them. The pictures should be pinned firmly to a flat surface before the wax is applied. Simply framed, they will look charming on the walls of a room.

Brown Smart for Town or Travel

its every detail. It excels in fine talloring. The jacket is of brown silk grograin with a waistcoat and skirt of brown checked beige wool. A note of red is carried out in the clever side fastening on the waistcoat and in the flat crepe necktie.

As the days go on it is apparent that the vogue for touches of brown is more pronounced than ever. Instead of the usual black ribbon or patent leather band on the now-so-popular panamas the latest wrinkle is trim it with brown.

HERE'S a sure-win tip on fashions now running—tones of brown for travel wear as well as for accessories.
The shopping list might begin in this way—brown coat or jacket suit, brown suede and calf pumps, matching calf bag, also a brown straw hat, either the new rough braid or one of the exotic linenlike straws and gloves, either brown or white.

For afternoon note down a brown-and-white print frock, to which by way of a postscript add a white taffeta silk jacket, also one of brown transparent velvet just for a change. A turban of straw and white pleated silk beanie which is swankiest in millinery if you do not prefer a white panama with a brown velvet or grograin band. It goes without saying that gloves with this outfit should be white and long loose-fitting, while shoes may be either white or white with brown.

Cotton Dress Favored for the Six-Year-Old

Throughout fashion's realm the style prestige of cotton weaves is a matter of comment. This pretty little dress is fashioned of malice-color "pineapple mesh" dures (perfectly mercerized) cotton. Inverted pleats starting at the yoke and a novel white collar are important styling features.

Color Combinations Now
Brighten the New Modes

Brown and yellow, green and crimson, gray and sapphire—these are the tints which now brighten a mode devoted to unusual color combinations instead of striking silhouettes.
Brown coats are worn with brick-red or leaf-green frocks, brown hats, gloves and belts. Brown suits are finished with lemon yellow, leaf green, or beige and copper striped blouses and chocolate hued accessories.

The woman whose suit is navy blue may choose white accessories, or a blouse of lemon yellow, while the debutante with a dark blue wool coat may wear a pastel blue or maize velvet frock with hat and shoes of dark blue. Geranium red combined with pearl gray is another favorite combination for navy.

Light green ensembles are worn with dark green chapeaux and accessories, while leaf-green frocks may be worn with black or wood brown coats, hats and bags.

BLACK AND WHITE
REMAINS IN FAVOR

Black and white continues to be a combination greatly in favor wherever smart women dine. The degree of taste and perfection which is used in this combination has a direct bearing on the effect of the costume. The all-white hat, the white glove and chalk-white jewelry has much to do with its success, says a fashion correspondent in the Kansas City Star.

White linen has a crispness which no one can deny, especially when it is combined with a black hat, either of coarse straw with a glazed surface or one of the crocheted straws. No one has ever known the exact percentage of white to advise in combination with black. Fashion is favoring the black satin skirt and the cream lace blouse for informal dining. This may be worn with a white or an egg-shell jacket.

Contrast is the watchword for the linen suit. The white skirt with the navy jacket has by far and away given the brown and white combinations a race for popularity, while red and white, or a cherry red linen skirt and a french blue handkerchief linen sur-plice blouse are in the height of fashion.

Or listen to this combination which was worn at the horse show in Tuxedo park by New York debutantes: White dresses accompanied by very short white wool capes, and a red and green sash at the belt and with these small white visca caps.

Longer Evening Coats
to Return for Winter

The longer evening coats show signs of returning next winter, advises a Paris fashion writer in the New York Times. Lucile Lacey favors slightly reeling evening coats, in velvet of the same color as frocks—which just escape the floor. Germaine Lecoq makes three-quarter evening coats of Lyons velvet or velveteen that contrast with the frock. A tiger-colored velvet coat with a black frock is a striking example. Irene Dana has an attractive floor-length evening coat of pale pink velveteen.

Short jackets are by no means abandoned. Worth and Irene Dana both show white cross-hatched velvet jackets barely below waistlength, and Worth's new summer and winter jackets of flat fur with fabric sleeves are among the most attractive evening wraps yet invented. They are cut with a dropped shoulder line and draped in around the waist, stopping just above the hip bones. One is of black broadtail with puffed sleeves of white satin; another of pale gray broadtail with huge sleeves in silver lame.

CHRISTIANITY SPREAD BY PER-SECUTION.LESSON TEXT—Acts 7:54-64; 11:19-21; 1 Pet. 4:12-19.

GOLDEN TEXT—Fear none of these things which thou shalt suffer: behold, the devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation ten days; but thou shalt find tribulation unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Gospel
Spread by Persecution.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Christianity Spread by Persecution.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOP-IC—Martyrs of the Early Church.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOP-IC—The Results of Persecution.

Christianity is a life, a "way." Because it is the life of God expressing itself through men, it is indestructible.
Its genius is to prosper through opposition. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church." Prosperity may ruin the church, but persecution never.

1. Stephen Stoned (Acts 7:54-60).

In Stephen's ministry as deacon he testified of Jesus Christ and wrought miracles in confirmation thereof. This caused violent opposition on the part of the synagogue officials. Not being able to meet the wisdom as Stephen spoke by the Holy Spirit, they stirred up the people against him. They arrested him and brought him before the council. They accused him of blasphemy and employed false witnesses against him. They could not silence him by argument before the council so they decided to do so by violence.

2. He saw the glory of God (v. 55).

A vision of God's glory only can be seen by those who are loyal to him even unto death.

3. He saw Jesus at the right hand of God (vv. 55, 56). The fact that Jesus was standing showed his actual interest in the sufferings of his faithful witness.

4. Cast out of the city and stoned
(vv. 58, 59).

5. His prayer (v. 60). He knelt down and cried with a loud voice,
"Lord, lay not this sin to their charge."
How like the prayer of Jesus on the cross!

6. He fell asleep (v. 60). The Christian's death is only a sleep.

II. Persecution of the Church at Jerusalem (Acts 8:1-4).

1. The ringleader (vv. 1, 3). As a member of the Sanhedrin Saul had cast his vote against Stephen. He perhaps was the Sanhedrin representative to guide and direct in the execution. Saul's consenting to Stephen's death shows that he was not taking part himself, but directing the activities.

2. The disciples scattered (v. 1). The stoning of Stephen had so aroused the passions of savage men that they proceeded to wreak vengeance upon the Christians, who, as a result, were scattered abroad.

3. Preaching the Word (v. 4).
Though forced out of Jerusalem, they did not go out in a panic, but went "everywhere preaching."

III. Preaching the Lord Jesus at Antioch (Acts 11:19-21).

In the providence of God a new missionary center was now being prepared. With the conversion of Saul and his commission as the apostle to the Gentiles, a new center was needed.
Antioch was well suited as that center, for it was the natural door to the Graeco-Roman world. The persecution at Jerusalem sent the disciples as far as Antioch.

1. Preaching to Jews only (v. 19).
In this they followed the example of Christ. They had not yet come to realize the universality of the gospel.
Even thus limited, they were used in carrying out the divine purpose.

2. Preaching to the Greeks (v. 20).
The disciples who had come from Africa and Cyprus were of broader sympathy than those of Palestine, and they courageously crossed the line preaching the Lord Jesus to the Greeks.
3. The hand of the Lord upon them
(v. 21). Perhaps the Holy Spirit was poured out anew as at Pentecost.
Their ministry was accompanied with the divine blessing. Many believed on the Lord through their ministry.

IV. Rejecting in Persecutions (I
Pet. 4:12-19).

Fierce trials are to be expected by the disciples of Christ. The world hated Christ and put Him to death.
To be reproached and hated for Christ's sake is a badge of honor, and those who may be called upon thus to suffer should rejoice.

Christ Wins at Last

No matter what the obstacles, Christ wins at last. No matter what the delays and disappointments, Christ triumphs in the end. In spite of suffering and loss and repeated defeats, Christ is the eternal conqueror. Lord, we believe! But we need a lot of help—Charles E. Jefferson.

ALBERT BALTZ DROWNS

OBITUARY

Thurman Shull, son of Jonathan and Mariah (Hadsell) Shull, was born in the Coburntown community December 6, 1867, and died in the same neighborhood July 22, 1931, having attained the age of 63 years, 6 months and 16 days.

Mr. Shull united in marriage with Miss Eva Benner January 12, 1893. To this union were born two sons: Mark Shull and Garth D. Shull; and three daughters: Mrs. Agnes Mercer of Hicksville; Mrs. Dale Hart of St. Joe, and Mrs. Doris Stuck of Garrett.

With these sons and daughters and the widow, there are also eleven surviving grandchildren composing the entire family of the deceased.

Mr. Shull is the third one of his parents' family to be called in death, and there are three living brothers: Cadmus of the home community; Carl and Fred of Hart, Michigan.

The deceased spent his life almost entirely in the community where he was born. However, he purchased a farm in the West Milford settlement and lived there for about four years, and then returned to the farm where he was born.

Mr. Shull united with the Church of Christ at Coburn's Corners when he was a young man, and contributed both of his time and means to that cause during his active life.

The funeral was conducted by Rev. J. N. Scholes, at the residence and interment was made in the Alton cemetery by E. R. Kinsey.

CARD OF THANKS

We desire to thank the neighbors and friends for their kind assistance during the sickness and death of our husband and father.

NOTICE OF ELECTION OF TRUSTEES

Notice is hereby given that there will be held a meeting of the members of the St. Joe Methodist Protestant Church of St. Joe, Indiana, at the aforesaid church in the town of St. Joe, DeKalb County, Indiana, on the 3rd day of August, 1931, at 7:30 P. M., for the purpose of electing one or more trustees for said Church.

By order of Pastor,
B. W. Mayfield.

Telephone 45 when you have some news.

THE SECOND REUNION

(An interesting three act play)
Time — Sunday, July 26, 1931
Place—Cheesetown

ACT I

Guests, including former teachers and students of the Cheesetown school and their families (about seventy in all) arrive, exchange hearty greetings, and receive introductions.

Three highly respected faces, which were present last year, were particularly missed because, during the year, Frank Scholes, S. D. Gee, and William Maxwell passed into the land beyond and left their places here forever vacant.

Among those present from a distance, who were not here last year, are Glen Abel of Peru, the Lloyd Betzner family of Columbia City, the Carl and Ross Monroe families, Mrs. C. J. Lake and Edward Kimes of Fort Wayne, and Willard Maxwell of Covington, Ky.

Tables are set in the school house, baskets unpacked, and soon everyone is loading his plate preparatory to the feast which follows. (Much enthusiasm should be presented here.)

After the meal, scraps are cleared away, baskets repacked, and tables removed.

ACT II

The curtain rises to disclose the same room with the same group of people, with a few additions, in orderly array awaiting the following program: (On account of an accident in which he hurt his arm, John Woodcox went home and Anna Frank led the singing in his place.)
Song—Auld Lang Syne.
Prayer—Rev. J. N. Scholes.
Welcome—Laney Gee.

Response—Mrs. Eva Sheffer.
Song—When You and I Were Young Maggie.
Reading—"A School Day," Virginia Shull.

Vocal Duet—Lucille Smith and Martha Frank.
Impromptu reminiscences by H. C. Hathaway, J. N. Scholes, Abner Trostel, and others.

ACT III

Same Setting. Same Characters. Business meeting held according to form with perhaps two things of interest to the public.

Arrangements are made to secure the old school bell from a Michigan farmer and reinstate it. The present officers are re-elected: President, Abner Trostel; vice president, Pluma Hamilton; secretary and treasurer, Mildred Currie.
Adjournment. Curtain.

Picnic an Annual Affair—Heart Attack Given as Cause of Death Resulting from Being Warm from Rowing Boat and then Plunging Into Lake

ALBERT BALTZ

Albert Baltz, 19 years old, of Spencer, was drowned Sunday afternoon about 4 o'clock in Adams Lake, three miles northeast of Wolcottville.

Albert, with other members of a Sunday School class of which Mr. Baltz was the teacher, had gone to Adams Lake for the day. Mrs. Baltz was also with the party.

After dinner and the study of the Sunday School lesson, several boys, including Albert took a row boat and went across the lake to a slide. They were returning when 50 feet from shore, Albert with several others jumped into the lake, intending to swim before striking the skirt of the slide. They were taken by the class for the day.

Albert had only about 25 feet to swim before striking the skirt of the shore line when he could have waded the remainder of the distance. After diving, Albert came to the surface, swam a short distance and sank. Before going down he called for help. A physician who made an examination said a heart attack caused his death.

After an hour's search the body was recovered. A pulmonologist was sent from Kendallville, physicians worked over the body for some time and members of a life saving crew at Oliver Lake tried resuscitation methods but life was extinct.

Albert, who graduated with the class of 1931 of the Spencer high school, was to have taken over the management of the Baltz farm about September 15th, on which date Mr. Baltz was to have become manager of the DeKalb county bulk plant in Auburn.

The young man had become proficient in farming and was active in 4-H club work. He received a number of prizes at stock and farm exhibits.

Albert and his sister, Irma, 13, were taken into the Baltz home six years ago, and, although not legally adopted, were considered as the children of Mr. and Mrs. Baltz. Albert was the oldest of a family of four children and Irma the youngest.

The funeral was held Wednesday forenoon from the Spencer-Lutheran Church, conducted by Rev. G. D. Stoll, with burial in Spencer cemetery.

George Brandon and Mark E. Stuck, living two miles southwest of Garrett, pleaded guilty to a charge of illegal possession of liquor when arraigned in the DeKalb circuit court Monday, and were fined $100 and costs each and sentenced to the penal farm for 45 days, by Judge William E. Endicott.

More than 1,000 bottles of home brew was confiscated in the raid on the farmhouse Saturday night by Sheriff John P. Hoff, Deputy Sheriff Herbert N. Grimm and Chief of Police Charles Davis of Auburn.

Several customers were present and the officers had no trouble locating the beer. Besides the bottled goods, there were about 30 gallons brewing in the cellar and upstairs. Brandon and Stuck said the amount on hand would last about four days. No whiskey was found. The court ordered the beer destroyed.

The affidavit against Brandon and Stuck was signed by Louis Erickson.

DRABNESS
WITHIN

By FANNIE HURST

(By the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

THERE is an all too large proportion of human beings who lead a dull life. Certain definite conditions of our civilization contribute to that pathetic end and help bring about the sin and the shame of it. Life, so short at its best, should be, if the little god-of-things-as-they-ought-to-be is at all merciful, an interval crowded with light. But we go ahead and cram man into the sometimes too tightly fitting shoe of civilization, cramp him mentally and physically into routine work, stultify his imagination by crucifying him on the cross of day-by-day stark reality and unless the individual develops the power and glory of resistance to mere external, the result is dangerously apt to be drab.

Nor is this quality of drabness necessarily confined to special social planes. It can hang in a pall over the rich and poor alike. Conspire as all these external conditions of society may, against the individual, it is undoubtedly a matter which lies within his power whether he will succumb or resist the deadliness of finding life drab.

As a matter of fact, even though so many of our lives seem thinned and classified, the way out is via the intellect, more than through release from routine. But the difficulty lies in its obviousness.

There is a certain experiment which is commonly practiced on college classes in psychology. The professor holds up a chart containing various pictures, sentences, figures, objects, characters and colors. The class is permitted to gaze upon the chart for the period of a moment or two and at the end of that time each member recites what he has seen.

The almost invariable result is a fine commentary upon the varying degree of thoroughness with which individuals observe. The majority of the class usually observes minimum. Some few have been alert to most of the objects, colors and characters, but only a select minority really sees in detail and with power of observation the contents of the chart.

Life can be drab because most of us are so busy missing the most of it, the aspect of it that is free for all. The adventure of the adventure that lies in our reach; the excitement of curiosity. The desire to know. Intellectual curiosity, meaning the desire and the vitality and the interest to delve into every minute aspect of life that presents itself, is the gateway to experience. Practically all the great figures of history have been blessed with it. To Caesars, Napoleons, Roosevelts, life cannot be commonplace, because so little appears to them as commonplace. Vigorous, seeking minds are not easily bored.

It is fair to assume that just as much of life is lying about us in our daily routine, as there is compressed between the leaves of books. Anyway it is worth seeking, and the way to seek is to take nothing for granted.

A subway jam contains enough of the possibility of adventure to blow up New York harbor. Scratch the surface of your desk neighbor and you will find the mystery of a pulsating, teeming, planning, scheming human being. Intellectual curiosity about people, places, street scenes, books, and above all, the desire to study and know the people who happen to be inhabiting this planet, on cold earth, during your same interval here, simply will not permit life to become drab.

That must be why the sort of human beings in whom you are impelled to confide your difficulties, problems, amours, seem always so filled with a certain power and strength. They are interested in people. They command confidence by wanting it. Nobody is just a person. Men and women are people! Exciting, problematic, subtle, dangerous, appealing, provocative, magnetic, repellent, alluring and human. And in the midst of this melee of the excitement of being human among humans, each of us is privileged to live his life. Just around the corner is no more to me, than it is to you. The unknown lurks there for one and for all. Intellectual curiosity is a magic carpet which can whisk you out of yourself, and yet how appalling, when one stops to consider, the lethargy toward life that falls to the lot of so many. The books that are never opened. The confidences that are never given or received. The friendships that are never made because two particular human beings had not the curiosity to want to know!

When it is said of a man that he is a good mixer, usually means that his life is crisscrossed with interests of various sorts. Who wants to know people, because he knows that within them lies the secret of keeping life quick with interest. He does not find life drab, chiefly because he is not drab. The same applies to the light that lies in the eyes of the bookworm. Strange thrills are his, strange reactions to beauty, because he has had the curiosity to go seeking them.

It is not only to those destined to walk high places or to roam the world that excitement of life can come. On the contrary, if the drabness lies within you, for those who see not, it is as equally boring to roam the world as it is to ride daily in the subway toward your job.

If not, then you are one of those to-be-convicted persons who sees with joyous, alert eyes the color, the shape, the significance of every object on the professor's chart and it requires no genius nor special equipment to do so. Just a deliberate love of life and a will to live it for all it is worth (and to such a person it is worth a great deal) and since we are all of us occupied with the business of living it, how joyful to be living it joyfully!

There is great deal of bubbling optimism which manifests itself in the so-called drab places of life; one is inclined to think just as much, if not more, than there is in the make-up of the synthetic kind of joys manufactured by the rich. Men digging ditches look no more oppressed with the heaviness of life than men sitting in opera boxes. No one can fairly blame his internal drabness upon external conditions if it is to be judged by the interchangeableness of human reactions. The rich can be drab; the poor can be drab and both can be drab.

Dull days come more readily to some than to others. You hear people say they are never bored. They cannot be drab inside. What they find in life may make them suffer as easily as it may bring them joy, but the unhappy medium is boredom. To be neither pained nor surprised; delighted nor depressed with life because the interior is a vast moor—gray—unlighted with interest or intellectual curiosity, is to be dead on your feet.

Boredom is the emotion of a vegetable.

Civility as Practiced

by Ordinary Citizen

He meets you on the street and asks how you have been and you tell him, with due emphasis on the pain in the small of the back, the headache of Wednesday and the eyestrain of the day before.

Nothing daunted, he inquires about your wife and you describe fully her state of health, her present interests and occupations. Then he expresses a desire to know about your children, which leads you to launch forth upon a discourse relative to their tonsils and adenoids and general physical condition, their lack of appetite, methods of discipline and punishment and problems that arise from school and play. Thanks to his continued attention, you are reminded of some of their bright sayings which you think bear repeating.

Next he asks after your business, and you enter at considerable length upon a summary of your achievements, of your future prospects and the discouragement resulting from association with men of decidedly limited vision.

He expresses an interest in the performance of your motor car and you recite to him numerous statistics relative to the cost of operation, the number of miles attained on a gallon of gas, the mileage got out of your tires, the periodic replenishment of oil, and other less important details. Before he leaves you he inquires also after your parents, your brothers and sisters and other intimate matters. But when he has departed it suddenly occurs to you that in your enthusiasm in talking about yourself and your own affairs you have neglected to reciprocate by asking after himself, or his health, or his family, or his business or his possessions, which gives the impression of your having been most ungracious.

However, there is at least one consolation—in all probability he has not listened to half you said to him anyway.—Baltimore Sun.

Episcopal Altar Vestments

In altar vestments in the Episcopal church white is used on all feasts and at all seasons relating to our Lord, such as Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, etc.; to the Blessed Virgin, and to those saints who were not also martyrs; at dedication and harvest festivals; at wedding and confirmation, and generally at the burial of infants. Red is used on the feasts of martyrs and at Whit Sunday. Green is used after the Epiphany and for the long summer season of Trinity and on all days which are not feasts or fasts. Violet is used throughout Advent, Septuagesima and Lent and on Vigils, Ember days and Rogation days. Black is used only on Good Friday, on All Souls' Day and at Offices for the dead.

Dancing Pavilion at Sea

A dancing pavilion at Eilatmore, Calif., is constructed on the lines of a boat and when the party is assembled the boat moves out to sea on a track which has been laid under the water, but the "boat" never leaves the rails. The dancers get the romance of the sea and the moon and all that as well as the refreshing breeze from the water. The experience answers all the purposes of a moonlight excursion.

Goose Got Homestead

Mrs. Charles Cox, resident of Manteca, Calif., has discovered that the domestic goose has a strong homing instinct. She bought a bird from Joe Vinet at Atlanta, five miles distant, and took it home and penned it. In the morning she found the goose gone. After a search she went to Vinet's farm. She had been there only a few minutes when the goose flew in and joined the other fowls.

Alaska's Panhandle

Geographic Harbor on Southern Coast of Alaska Peninsula.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

LANS of Colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh to fly to the Orient and their first reported intention to fly westward focuses attention on the air route to Asia along Alaska's southeast "panhandle," the great Alaska peninsula and the Aleutian Islands, all under American jurisdiction; Kamchatka, a part of the Soviet Union; and the Kurile Islands, northern extension of Japan.

The route is an ideal one as far as landing places are concerned for planes fitted with pontoons, for while most of the ground is rough, there are innumerable coves and harbors among the islands and in their indentations. The route was first shown to be practicable by the group of United States army flyers who flew around the world in 1924.

The first leg of the route, after the United States proper is left, leads over the straits along the west coast of British Columbia, then over the island-studded Inland Passage of southeast Alaska. Beyond the northern end of the Inland Passage comes the open water of the Gulf of Alaska until Kodiak Island is reached, south of the tip of this peninsula. It is from the tip of this peninsula that the 1,500-mile crescent of the Aleutian Island chain sweeps off toward Asia.

The Aleutians are volcanic, a fact made plain by the first and largest of the "stepping stones," Unimak. Although it has an area only a little larger than Rhode Island, so many craters occur on Unimak island that there is a great deal of confusion as to the location of the various eruptions reported. Mount Shishaldin, often reported active, is the most striking and beautiful of the eleven major craters of the island. It has one of the most nearly perfect cones in the world, seeming to float suspended in the air above its cloud-girt base.

What Unimak is like. Despite Unimak's size and its separation from the mainland of Alaska by only a narrow strip of water, it is of little importance. There are no good harbors around its shores and only one settlement, Cape Alait village, is listed.

Cod fishing on the great banks to the south of the island, which are similar to those of Newfoundland, and the mining of small quantities of sulphur and pumice stone are the principal industries. The inhabitants are mostly the remnants of the original native tribes found here by the Russians in the eighteenth century.

Like its sister islands, Unimak is in general desolate and scraggy along its rocky, grass-covered lower slopes. It is treeless, and, except for its heavy rainfall and fog, has a delightful climate. Summers in Unimak are cooler than places farther north, while in winter the weather is milder than that of Tennessee or Kentucky, twenty degrees of latitude farther south. The warm Japan current, which creeps up the coast of Asia and around the Aleutians, gives it a January average of thirty degrees above zero.

Grasses of all kinds grow in abundance in the lowlands all year round, but the climate is too damp to mature grain. Although the soil is rich, being composed of a vegetable mold mixed with volcanic ash, the land is rugged and there are no places where farms of any size can be made. Small though the island is, the inhabitants have never been thoroughly explored.

Unimak and other islands of the Aleutian chain, believed to be the route by which man first migrated to the Western Hemisphere, should be better known to the world at large, for they are on the shortest route between our northwestern states and Japan. The great expanse of the Pacific and the curvature of the earth places Yokohama almost due north of Seattle, if one follows the most direct path.

The American world flyers remember Unimak as part of one of the difficult stages in their globe-circling trip. Port Moller, the community to which Major Martin made his way on foot after his plane crashed, is about 150 miles farther east. The district presented the same pitfalls for aviators as Unimak, conical peaks and sharp ridges rising suddenly out of dreary fog-hidden tundras and marshes. Portage Bay, where a forced landing was made, is on the mainland opposite Kodiak Island, but is similar to the few indentations of Unimak's shoreline, with rocky cliffs and treacherous sand shoals.

The Aleutians, however, have an added handicap in the "williwags," cyclonic winds peculiar to the region and probably attributable to the meeting of the cold winds from the north and the warm breezes from the Japan current.

Unalak, a hundred miles farther east, is the second largest of the Aleutians. On it is situated Dutch Harbor, port of call for vessels plying between Seattle and Nome. This harbor has deep water at its wharves and a protected anchorage that could accommodate the largest battle fleet. The shortest sea route between Seattle and Yokohama (the great circle route) lies practically through Dutch Harbor, and it may some time become an important coaling and provisioning point. Because of the dangers from fogs and rocks, however, ships now swing well south of the Aleutians. Only a few natives and whites live at Dutch Harbor. Nearby is the village of Unalak, a native community.

The Aleutians were born of volcanic action, and the activity is not yet spent. Bogoslof Island, some 50 miles from Dutch Harbor, is continually changing its form, rearing one smoking promontory after another above the waves and withdrawing others.

Volcanoes are to be found in the Aleutians in every stage of development: young and aged volcanoes, active and dormant, not only cones whose symmetry rivals that of Fujiyama, but also the jagged stumps of mountains that have been blown to bits by recent volcanic explosions. Volcanologists consider it one of the best known fields for the study of the problems of vulcanism.

Attu is the easternmost of the Aleutian Islands, 2,700 miles from the coast of Washington state. Because the International Date Line lies just beyond Attu, an airman, rising from the island to continue his flight, plunges directly into another day without the lapse of any time. Thus, if he starts from this westernmost American station Monday morning, he will be flying a few moments later in the morning of the day that it is the Eastern Hemisphere is Tuesday.

Traveling in Kamchatka.

The Aleutian route strikes the main land of Asia at the coast of Kamchatka, 450 miles east of Attu. This peninsula and the country north of it to the Bering strait contains a large area of tundra or Arctic plains; soft spongy morasses during the few months of summer; frozen, snow-covered wastes in winter. In the higher land impenetrable underbrush springs up in summer. What little travel is possible at this season is done on the backs of sturdy ponies who must wade up the shallow streams or plod through the sticky swamps. In winter travel is easy. Teams of dogs and reindeer which laden sledges over the frozen surface of the streams and across the snow of the tundra at a rate, under favorable circumstances, of 75 miles or more a day.

In the summer the surge of the moist regions of the north strikes the Kamchatkan country; swarms of mosquitoes and flies thicken the air and make life miserable for all living things. The nomadic fleas with their herds of reindeer to the sea coast, where the breezes give some relief.

The Kamchatkan peninsula proper is about 750 miles in length, and the distance from its roots to Bering strait is an equal distance. Kamchatka lies in the same latitude as the British Isles, while the country north to the Arctic ocean is in the latitude of Norway. The Kamchatkan region is heated by convection currents instead of the warm Gulf stream, and its climate is therefore much colder than that of Britain or Scandinavia.

From the southern tip of Kamchatka the Kurile Islands sweep southward to the major islands of Japan. This distant string of fog-enshrouded, storm-lashed islands is the most westerly group of the north Pacific's bridges of islands. Like the Aleutians, the Kuriles are a string of volcanic peaks, dead and alive, whose smoking heads protrude above the cold and stormy waters of the North Pacific and stake out the Sea of Okhotsk. Thus, they form a haven for the Japanese fishermen who swarm over this island-girt sea in summer. Stretching between Kamchatka and the Japanese island of Yezo, they have long been known to the Russians who exploited their valuable furs. Not until recent years have the Japanese become interested in these near door neighbors.

The desolate islands are "a cradle of hazards" hazards to the mariner and aviator alike. Storms and squalls spring up from nowhere, lowlying fogs hug the water's surface in spring and summer, hidden rocks lie in wait for the unwary navigator and swift currents race through narrow straits. However, the low mists may tell when he is close by the vast fields of brown seaweed or kelp which float on the water. Old salts who can "smell the beach" when near land are not alone in this useful ability when sailing these foggy waters.

Sheet Erosion Is Great DestroyerVast Area Being Washed Thinner by Each Succeeding Rain.

Sheet erosion, the unending process which steals a part of the topsoil every time there is rain enough for water to run downhill, is a major cause of land depreciation, H. H. Bennett, soil scientist of the United States Department of Agriculture, said at the annual meeting of the American Forestry association at Asheville, N. C.

Sheet Erosion Widespread.

"Sheet erosion is much more widespread than gully washing, but it is more gradual and less noticeable," Mr. Bennett said. "Excessive washing has virtually destroyed more than 17,000,000 acres of formerly tilled land in this country, but there is a vastly larger area whose surface soil is slowly but constantly being washed thinner and thinner by every rain. The washing away of the topsoil is rapidly lessening the productivity of our land."

"Our country-wide yields are not increasing, even with all the benefits of research and extension services directed toward this end; indeed, crop yields are decreasing in many localities. The better soils are largely in use. In many parts of the country the area of these is being diminished through the evil of erosion; that is, more and more of these lands are being converted into inferior lands."

Land impoverished from over-cropping frequently can be made to produce profitable crops through the use of fertilizing and soil-improving crops, he said, but land worn out by erosion is essentially hopeless.

The topsoil contains the essential elements for plant growth and when this soil is eroded away, the subsoil in the majority of cases fails to produce as good crops as the original topsoil and often is worthless, the bureau of chemistry and soils has found.

Methods of Prevention.

Mr. Bennett outlined some of the work being done by the Department of Agriculture in the study of erosion and methods of preventing it. He suggested better land utilization, better protection of cultivated slopes with terraces and other means, and the use of certain lands for forests as preventives of soil erosion. A far-reaching, practical, national program of soil protection and better adjustment of land usage is an immediate need, he said.

Thorough study of erosion problems is now being made by the department at eight regional experiment stations established during the last two years. These stations, which eventually may number 20, are established on farms where erosion is a serious regional problem, and are for studying methods of erosion control and of holding on the land more of the rain water. A number of the states are carrying on supplementary work on erosion.

Phosphorus Is Necessary

for Bone Construction

Phosphorus is a material necessary in the construction of bone, but its greatest value seems to be in the production of seed and grain. The phosphorus plant uses over and above that needed to form the leaf, stalk and root seems to be a measure of its ability to form the protoplasmic nucleus, around which the grain is formed, and without which no grain will be formed. Because of this association phosphorus has sometimes been called the life-giving element. When there is a good growth of leaf and stalk, grain is increased in proportion as the phosphorus is increased, other things being equal. Where grain is not produced in proper proportion to leaf surface, it is an indication of a deficiency of phosphorus. Usually the growth of stalk and leaf is an approximate measure of the available nitrogen, and the grain produced is a measure of the phosphorus secured, above what was used for growing stalk. Land that is rich in humus and available nitrogen will grow straw and stalks largely in excess of a proportionate amount of grain and unless more phosphorus is applied there is a great waste.

Getting Ride of Moles

in Lawns and Gardens

The best way to get rid of moles in lawns and gardens is to trap them, says the biological survey of the United States Department of Agriculture. If there are only a few, however, and it does not seem desirable to resort to trapping, good results may be obtained by the use of moth balls. Open the runways at the edge of the lawn or garden with a trowel and drop in a moth ball or two, or a spoonful of naphthalene flakes, and replace the earth. Moles dislike the odor, and it may prove fairly effective in keeping them away from the garden.

Oats for Stock

Corn must be exceedingly cheap to be more economical than oats for almost any class of live stock, it costs less for 20 cents a bushel. Oats makes an excellent feed for milk cows. Few experts in figuring rations for dairy cattle leave out oats. Among the most palatable feeds that can be given to milk cows are corn, oats, wheat bran, linseed oil meal and molasses. Oats is keeping pretty fast company when it is listed with such palatable feeds as corn and linseed meal, but it has been placed in such company by the best of authorities.

The general public cannot help but take notice when confronted by the views of the young society girl in Brookline, Mass., when she came up to take her test for a driver's license. She proved that she could drive her car very well indeed, parked perfectly and seemed in every way competent. But the oral examination was different.

"What," asked the examiner pleasantly, "did you find most difficult to learn in driving a car?"

"How to hit pedestrians with the least damage to my car," was the cool and utterly sincere reply.

Ethiopian Pretender With His Eight Sons

European thrones are not the only ones that have "pretenders." Here is Ras Har-Berd el Rasu, who claims the throne of Ethiopia now occupied by Emperor Ras Tafari Makonnen, posing for the photographer with his eight sons.

Polish Gentleman Is No Apollo, But He Sure Has a Way With Women

Warsaw.—Leo Weldenberg, a tailor by profession and a husband by avocation, is front-page copy for the Warsaw newspapers, and his genius deserves even wider attention. Although he is sixty-one years old and the owner both of a red beard and an ugly face, he has been married eight times and his offspring number 40.

When his eighth wife appeared before a magistrate recently in a plea for a divorce she brought with her other wives, all undivided, to aid her cause. But she did not consider that all were women of tender hearts and stanch attachment to her philandering mate. The moment Mrs. Weldenberg was brought in all the former Mrs. Weldenbergs started a fight for him. During the scramble Weldenberg modestly disappeared and for all anybody knows is marrying again.

Decides to Travel.
Meantime, stories of his escapades lengthen. Forty-three years ago Weldenberg, then a youth of eighteen, resided in Warsaw as a tailor's apprentice, known among his chums as "Red" because of his flaming hair. He married Rebecca Frol and during seven years of wedlock five children were born.

Then he disappeared. All search for him was in vain and his wife and children suffered great need. Weldenberg had decided to travel. He went to Russia and after changing from the Jewish faith to Russian orthodox, he married a girl and begot five children. After eight years of marriage in Russia he wandered and seized him again and he returned to Poland. On a river boat from Warsaw to Plock he fell in love with a Jewish girl named Channa Zeburk. Having his old papers he was married by a rabbi and within four years—four children blessed this union.

Changes Faith Again.
At Lublin he met Mary Nowak. Weldenberg had to change his faith again. He became a Roman Catholic. There followed another marriage, and twins. Two years later he was in Piotrkow and there met Joan Silva, a member of the Marjavit sect of the Catholic church, unrecognized by the pope. Weldenberg became a Marjavit and married Joan. Five children blessed this union.

Weldenberg then went to America. There followed a marriage to Wilma Rosenkrans of New York. Two children were born and he returned hastily to Poland, a deportee. He continued his career through two more marriages.

Lips and Eyes Tested as Keys to Character
Oxford, England.—The theory that lips and eyes are a key to vocation and character, suggested by Professor Bettmann, the Heidelberg dermatologist, was tested at a gathering at an Old Students' reunion at Oxford university. Many men distinguished in different walks of life were chosen for the test. It was found that while there was some link between certain features and character, the theory appeared correct only in the generalized sense, but there was one exception. The legal profession, it was found, had one predominant facial feature—the thin lip. Professor Bettmann maintains that deep thinkers have the thinnest lips.

Mormon Mantle Shelves to Adorn Parish House

Auburn, N. Y.—Two mantle shelves carved by Brigham Young, Mormon leader, will decorate a Presbyterian parish house. The mantle shelves are of marble neatly chiseled. Together with timbers from the house in which they were placed nearly a hundred years ago, they will become a part of the Second Presbyterian parish house, now under construction. Brigham Young's boyhood days were spent in Port Byron, in the heart of the Finger lake region of New York.

riages but tripped up when he arrived in Warsaw. One of his former wives met him on the street. He was arrested and admitted his guilt. He gave the names of his wives. Six could be summoned. The Russian and American ones have not been called yet. The grand total resulted in eight wives and 40 children. Thirty-nine have been located.

Revolution Gives Spain New Bullfighting Slang

Madrid.—Bullfighting slang has a new word added to its vocabulary—"monarchy," and its derivatives. Thus an entirely bad bullfight is a "monarchical" bullfight. A bullfighter who is no good has gone "monarchical," and the "fan" is entitled to yell at him, "You're worse than the monarchy."

Recently the noted bullfighter, "Gitanillo de Triana," whose real name is Francisco Vega de los Reyes (reys means kings), appeared in Valencia, but the posters read: "Francisco Vega de la Republica."

Hunter Bros. Retain Air Refueling Record
Washington.—The Federation Aeronautique Internationale of France, because of certain technical conditions, has not approved the refueling endurance record of Dale Jackson and Forest O'Brien, made last year near St. Louis. They stayed aloft 647 hours and 28 minutes. Since their record has not been approved the official refueling record is still held by the Hunter brothers, 553 hours and 41 minutes.

DAIRY FACTS

RATIONS FAVORED FOR DAIRY HERD

Cows on Pasture Need Grain for Best Results.

Even though the milking herd is on excellent pasture it is necessary to feed grain if the best results are to be obtained, states C. L. Blackman, extension specialist in animal husbandry at the Ohio State university. Sometimes, he says, the amount of grain need not be as large as when the cows are in the barn, but very often the grain allowance should be the same. The most practical method of providing a grain ration for dairy cattle is to determine the kind of ration necessary and supply this to the entire milking herd.

If a certain cow has a tendency to become fat and decrease in milk production too early, he points out, it is well to add a little extra high protein feed to her ration. This tends to stimulate milk production rather than fat accumulation.

If another cow, milking heavily, has a tendency to get thin, it is well to add extra corn and oats or other high carbohydrate feeds to her ration. It is not practical to make a separate grain mixture for each cow in the herd.

When alfalfa, sweet clover, soybean hay, or pasture is fed with or without silage, Blackman believes good results may be obtained by feeding a grain mixture consisting of 300 pounds of corn or corn-and-cob meal or hominy or barley, 200 pounds ground oats, 100 pounds wheat bran, 50 pounds of cottonseed meal, and 50 pounds of linseed oil meal or soybean meal. Another good ration contains 200 pounds of corn or corn-and-cob meal or hominy or barley, 100 pounds of ground oats, 100 pounds of wheat bran, 50 pounds of gluten feed, and 50 pounds of cottonseed meal or oil meal.

Find Cod Liver Oil Not Needed in Calf Ration

Do calves actually live without vitamin D?

To answer this question, Bus Bohstedt, E. B. Hart, and I. W. Rupel, of the Wisconsin College of Agriculture, have been conducting experiments with growing calves to which they fed a ration markedly deficient in vitamin D.

Experimental results published two years ago tended to show that cod liver oil when added to a normal calf ration containing clover or alfalfa hay, adds no value to the ration.

The results now indicate that vitamin D is needed in the normal growth of calves. The ration used in this trial, which is presumably free from vitamin D, consisted of yellow corn, corn gluten meal, linseed meal, wheat middlings, calcium flour or calcium carbonate, and salt, with ground wood shavings for roughage.

In June, 1929, two calves were started on this ration and two on the ration plus cod liver oil. The calves receiving the cod liver oil grew to splendid condition and showed no indication of rickets.

The two receiving the ration only, after six or seven months of feeding, showed marked disturbances. The calcium content of the blood was greatly reduced. Symptoms of rickets were apparent and the investigations concluded that calves need vitamin D, but it is their opinion that the normal farm ration fed young calves probably carries a sufficient amount of vitamin D.

Dairy Notes

Some farmers consider the conveniences of silage its greatest advantage.

Grain feeding is necessary when cows are on pasture if milk yield is large.

Young calves usually are made sick by over-feeding or feeding from unsanitary silos that are unsanitary. Since the calves nurse the cows it is quite likely that they get too much milk.

Where silage fills a definite and important place in the feeding system, as in feeding dairy cattle, or where a succulent feed is needed to supplement pasture in the summer, the use of the silo may be advisable or necessary.

When one to two weeks old the calf should be taught to eat grain and hay and should have free access to salt. Experiments have shown that corn and grain are suitable and economical supplements to skim milk.

Silage is used as a substitute for pasture in winter and as a supplement to short pastures in summer.

Clean dry quarters, clean pails, skim milk and grain in medium amount, fresh water, and a yard for exercise, make up the requirements for raising calves successfully.

Wash and scald the separator, cans and pails, and all utensils immediately after using and keep them dry while not in use. Sunshine is a cheap and effective drying agency.

Organization in Move for Better Business

The Better Business bureau is an agency semipublic in character that aims to protect the public against merchants who make false or misleading statements in their advertising and against the promoters and sellers of fake stocks and other alleged securities. This organization, which is a unit only in the common purpose and methods of operations, is composed of the National Better Business bureau and local bureaus in some 40-odd cities. Each local bureau is a distinct entity supported by and owing allegiance to only its own community, and it is not a member of or subsidiary to the National Better Business bureau. The bureaus are financed by merchants, manufacturers and other financial interests. Their activities are furthered immeasurably by the co-operation of newspapers and monthly publications. The slogan of the magazine of the national organization is "To increase public confidence in business by promoting fair play in advertising and selling."

Average Weekly Wages Put at Less Than $25

According to estimates made by Anna Rochester, the average weekly earnings of some 10,000,000 wage earners are less than $25 a week. Only in construction do average wages rise above $30 a week, although within every one of the industrial groups various skilled trades have gained through themselves or through organization a considerably higher status. The union members who run our trains, build our skyscrapers, repair our plumbing, make our suits and dresses, and others—a very few groups in all—who with strong organizations have forced wage scales far above the average, include among them possibly an eighth of the steel workers, even a smaller number of the automobile workers, a considerable number of nonunion building trades and clothing trades and the small number of the army of stenographers and bookkeepers.—Washington Star.

All Sorts of Pictures Popular With Eskimos

Newspapers with colored comics, catalogues, illustrated travel magazines and juvenile picture books are popular with Eskimos, both adult and youth, at Point Barrow, Alaska. Many fur traders win the good will of famous hunters and possessors of good furs by gifts of catalogues picturing guns, power boats, tents and such outdoor items. The women are equally interested in the large mail order dry goods and household goods catalogues. Teachers in government schools take advantage of this love for pictures in the Eskimo language in teaching them to read. The natives bring a postmaster a catalogue and some money, asking him to send away for the item at the end of the stubby, greasy finger. Considerable mail order, parcel post business is conducted in this manner with business firms in Pacific cities.

Three Ages
Mary Jane entered public school when few months past five years old. After a few days at school she went to a neighbor's and said: "You know I got three ages?" "No; how does that happen?" the neighbor said. "Well, I am six at school, five at home and four on the street car," she replied.

New Helicopter Tested
Tests of a new form of helicopter invented by Oehmichen, the French engineer, are said to have been successful. The trials were made at Valenciennes, near Paris. In the first test Oehmichen made an absolutely vertical flight of 200 feet with perfect stabilization, which was followed by a perfect descent.

Fragrant Sassafras

It was the Indians who first discovered the stimulating qualities of the fragrant bark and roots of sassafras and passed them on to the early French and Spanish settlers. Legend tells us that the sassafras odor was wafted to the nostrils of Columbus on his first voyage and convinced him that land was near. Thoreau wrote of the plant: "The green leaves bruised have the fragrance of lemons and 1,000 spices."

NUMBER 32

JOHN BETZ DIES SUDDENLY

HEAVY FIRE LOSS LAST TUESDAY NIGHT

Last week the large barn on what is familiarly known as the Swineford farm, 3 miles north of St. Joe, was completely destroyed by fire of unknown origin, at about 10 o'clock. The structure was erected 51 years ago by A. E. Swineford and was of the bank type construction and was 40x70. The farm is now owned by Wm. Curie and Frank Baker is tenant. Mr. Curie carried $1,200 insurance on this barn and Mr. Baker carried $2,600 on all of his personal. The adjustment of the insurance has been made and Mr. Baker draws $1,800 and Mr. Curie $1,200.

The barn contained two automobiles, one of which was not covered, 541 bushels of wheat, 600 bushels of oats, 27 tons clover hay, all machinery except binder and loader and 5 horses. Mr. Curie lost 5 tons of hay and 115 bushels of wheat and 2 straw stacks.

The barn was completely enveloped in flames before discovered and it drew a mammoth crowd.

Plans are made for a new structure 36x60, to be located northeast of the residence.

ROAD PROJECTS IN COUNTY MAKING PROGRESS

The center mile of the new pavement on the Waterloo-Hamilton road was opened to traffic Friday by Contractor Ray L. Harris of Fort Wayne.

This mile starts at Taylor's Corners and runs south. The road is still closed north from No. 27 three and a half miles. Nine men are now at work on the road commencing at Hamilton and running south under the direction of E. E. Turner, county highway superintendent. The grade is being widened to a 50-foot-right-of-way and 1,300 yards of gravel to the mile is being laid. Asphaltic oil, for which the county commissioners recently contracted, will then be applied. The entire project from No. 27 north to Hamilton is expected to be completed by September 1.

The berm of the St. Joe-Spenville road was practically completed Saturday, with the exception of some patching to do along the road and putting on the final touches where the berm had settled. The paving has been open to traffic for two weeks.

Gravel road projects let by contract and recently completed are the Steckley road in Wilmington township and the William Staman road in Concord township, while the Griffin road in Wilmington and the Boyd Jennings road in Troy are nearly finished. Work on the Clidie Phillips road in Smithfield and the Hoodelmier road in Union is under way and the construction of the Cedar Chapel road in Butler township was started Thursday.

The county proposes to reditch and resurface eight miles of road yet this season, including two miles on the north end of the Auburn-Ashley road, three miles on the county line west of Ashley and three miles on the Cornum-Helmer road.

burned to the ground. Mr. Mullett, who lives 3/4 mile west of Mt. Pleasant Church had just left home for Butler, and his wife reported an explosion of a gasoline barrel had taken place and set fire to the garage. The neighbors were called by phone and saved the house with only slight damages.

ST. JOE FISH AND GAME CLUB MEETING

The St. Joe Fish and Game Club, in keeping with its policy of giving this community something worth while, held a public meeting at the Community Building on Thursday evening, August 6th.

The program consisted of several musical numbers by Donald Kinsey's Orchestra and an illustrated lecture on bird life in Indiana by Frederick Test from the State Conservation Department. The program was very interesting and a good sized crowd was in attendance, at least half of the attendance being boys and girls for whom this was especially given.

A report was given on the number of pests, such as rats, hawks, sparrows, crows, etc. killed during the last three months and it is amazing the amount that was reported.

The bird house building contest was brought to a close and the houses judged and prizes given out. While the number of houses exhibited was small yet the quality was excellent. Chas. and LeRoy Coburn captured all the prizes as there was no competing entries.

The Association will endeavor from time to time to put on programs and contests that are considered worth while to this community.

SECHLER REUNION

The forty-first annual reunion of the Sechler family was held at the home of Miss Susan Sechler St. Joe, Ind., Sunday, August 9, 1931. The business hour followed in which officers were elected for the ensuing year, Frank Baltz, president; Henry Sechler, vice president; Sam Mumaw, treasurer, and Grace Curle, secretary.

At a late hour in the afternoon everyone departed for their homes agreeing to meet with Mr. and Mrs. Frank Baltz of Spencerville for the next reunion.

The Sechlers were indeed surprised to find some of the Pennsylvania relatives present, Mrs. Kate Seiberling, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Yokohomis and son, Charles, of Tamagua, Pa., and Miss Helen Heinle of Reading, Pa. In all seventy-five members were present.

POLICE OFFICER STOPPING DRIVERS AND CHECK CARS

In furtherance of a campaign against violations of the state motor vehicle law, State Highway Policeman Art Zimmerman of Auburn, has been stopping drivers throughout the county.

A large number were found without driver's license or ownership cards in their cars and were warned to carry them in the future. Others were directed to have their headlights placed in good condition.

The penalty is severe for violations of this nature, providing a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $100 and for the third offense a jail sentence of thirty days.

HICKSVILLE QUARTET END 8,000 MILE TRIP

The A. B. C. quartet, composed of Dwight Burlingame, Joe and Paul Carr and Mervin Applegate, who have been gone over a month on a motor trip to San Francisco to attend the International Christian Endeavor convention, have arrived home.

They made the trip with an old touring car, traveled over 8,000 miles, and had no tire or engine trouble during the entire trip. They went by the southern route and returned by way of the Yellowstone National Park.

They appeared several times on the program of the convention.

Suffers Heart Attack Tuesday Night From Over Exertion Cranking Car

AUTO HITS AGED MAN

Edward Rowe, 78, former resident of Butler, was killed almost instantly Sunday night about 10 P. M., when he was struck by an automobile as he walked on State Road No. 6 a mile west of Butler. The auto was driven by Charles Demuth of Waterville, O., who said he did not see the man. Demuth stopped and cared for the man.

Rowe had been living at the DeKalb county infirmary near Auburn until a week ago, when he went to the home of a daughter, Mrs. Forest Myers of Waterloo. He is thought to have been walking to Butler when he was struck.

Besides his daughter, the man is survived by a son, Levi Rowe of north of St. Joe.

Coroner John Clark said after a preliminary investigation that he does not believe Demuth was at fault.

THE STORY

With his English wife, Catherine, and son, Jeems, Henry Bulain, French settler in Canada in 1749, cultivates a farm adjacent to the Tontout seigneurie. As the story opens the Bulains are returning from a visit to the Tontouts. Catherine's wandering brother, Hepsibah, meets them with presents for the family. To Jeems he gives a pistol, bidding him perfect himself in marksmanship. Hepsibah fears for the safety of the Bulains in their isolated position. Jeems fights with Paul Tache, cousin of Tontout's, whom they both adore.

Jeems was aware of her presence and physically sensible of her combativeness, but in the complexity of action which surged over and about him he could afford no discrimination in the manner of using his arms, legs, teeth, and head, and at last, finding herself disengaged, Tontout's scolded at her feet considerably bruised and in such disorder that no one would have recognized her as the splendid little lady of the seigneurie who had come so proudly to Lussan's place a short time before. Her handsome hat was a crumpled wreck in the mud. Her dress was twisted and bedraggled. Her hands and face were discolored with soil, and her hair was so tangled about her that she was almost smothered in it. Despite this physical condition, her mental self was more than ever inflamed with the desire to fight, and seizing upon the hard and woodlike stalk of a last year's sunflower which lay in the dirt, she succeeded in bringing it down with such force that, missing Jeems, it caught Paul on the side of the head and laid him sprawling flat on his face. This terminated the conflict for Tontout, who gave a cry of apprehension when she saw what she had done.

Paul had recovered from Tontout's blow before Jeems could take advantage of it, and what happened during the final round of contention remained largely a matter of speculation in Jeems' mind. He was sitting up, after a little, and there was no one to strike at. Paul and Tontout were out of his reach, yet he heard their voices, oddly indistinct, moving in the direction of Lussan's house. He tried to call out, thinking that Tache was escaping like a coward, but something in his throat choked him until it was impossible for him to get breath enough to make a sound. He made an effort to rise that he might pursue his beaten enemy. The earth about him swam dizzily. He was gasping, sick at his stomach, and blood was dripping from his nose.

A horrifying thought leapt upon him, and so sudden was the shock of it that he sat staring straight ahead, barely conscious of two figures emerging from the concealment of a thick growth of brushwood twenty paces away. The thought became conviction. He had not whipped Paul Tache! Paul had whipped him—and his enemy's accomplishment had been so thorough that he could still feel the instability of the world about him as he drew himself to his feet.

His eyes and head cleared as the realization of defeat swept over him. Then he recognized the two who had appeared in the edge of the open. One was his Uncle Hepsibah, the other Tontout's father. Both were grinning broadly at the spectacle which he made, and as they drew nearer he heard Tontout's voice in what was meant to be a confidential whisper.

"Is it really your petit-neveu, friend Adams, or one of Lussan's pigs come out of its wallow? Hold me, or what I have seen will make me spit!"

But Jeems heard no response from Hepsibah, for the trader's face suddenly lost its humor, and in place of it came a look which had no glint of smile or laughter in it.

CHAPTER IV

Next Sunday morning Jeems set out for Tontout's manor with the thought deeply entrenched in his mind that he would not fight Paul Tache that day no matter what temptation might be placed in his path. He had told his mother where he was going and what he was planning to do, and with her encouragement to spur him on he felt eager and hopeful as he made his way toward the seigneurie.

This feeling was unlike the one with which he had set out to fight Paul Tache, and what he had to do loomed even more important than any physical vanquishment which he might bring upon his rival. To soften Tontout's heart, now so bitterly against him, to bring back the friendliness of her smile, and to see her eyes alight with the sweetness which she had been on the point of yielding to him at Lussan's place were foremost in his mind. He was anxious to see Tontout and to offer her all that his small world held, if thereby he could make amends for the ruin and humiliation he had brought upon her. A spirit of chivalry in him, older than his years, rose above the lowly consideration of rights and wrongs. He was sure he was right. Yet he wanted to say he was wrong. Though he did not know it, years had passed since two days ago, and he was a new Jeems going to a new Tontout. His fear of her had vanished. He was no longer borne down by a feeling of littleness and unimportance, and for the first time he was visiting Tontout manor without the thought of inferiority sending its misgivings through his soul. In some mysterious way which he did not understand, but which he strongly felt, he had passed away from yesterday forever.

Soon his feet were in the path which led to the manor. It was so still he could have believed that every one was asleep as he courageously mounted the wide steps to the door of Tontout's home. On this door was a great black knocker of battered iron. The face of the knocker was a grinning ogre, a gargoylish head which, from his earliest memory of it, had fixed itself upon him as a symbol of the grim and unapproachable spirit that guarded the rooms within. His hand reached out to awaken the dull thunder of its voice.

"I Ask You to Forgive Me."

His fingers touched the cold iron. He hesitated in the moment he was lifting it, for he observed that the door was open by a space of a few inches. Through this aperture a voice came to him clearly. It was a high, biting, angry voice, and he recognized it as Madame Tontout's. He raised the weight from its metal panel and would have knocked when he heard a name which made him pause in rigid silence. It was his own.

He heard Tontout's mother say, "Henri Bulain was a fool for marrying this good-for-nothing English woman, and Edmond is a greater fool for not driving her from the country when her breed is murdering and killing almost at our doors. The woman was made for a spy, despite the pretty face which has softened Edmond's silly heart, and that boy of hers is no less English than she. The two should not be allowed to live so near to us, yet Tontout maintains they are his friends. The place they have built should be burned and the English woman and her boy sent where they belong. Let Henri Bulain go with them if he chooses to be a renegade instead of a Frenchman!"

"Fit upon you for such thoughts, Henriette," chided the milder voice of Madame Tache. "I despise the English as much as you or Tontout, but it is unfair to voice such invective against these two, even though the woman is proud of her pretty face and her boy is a mud-slinging little wretch. Edmond is a big-souled man and sim-

Bright Idea That May Have Averted Tragedy

Allusions to the effective use of ridicule against his opponents made by the late Lord Balfour during the term of his chief secretaryship for Ireland recalls an incident of long ago, when a body of convicted prisoners who had been concerned in one of the rebellions—the 1848—had to be marched through the streets of Dublin. The authorities had been warned that a desperate attempt at rescue might be made by the mob and even though a military escort had been provided, there was some uneasiness. In these circumstances a really brilliant notion occurred to the officer in command of the troops. He gave instructions at the last moment that the suspended buttons on the trousers of the prisons were to be cut off and thus they had to walk through the streets holding up their trousers. Just as the spectacle was greeted with roars of laughter by the crowd, and no more was heard of the attempted rescue.—Montreal Family Herald.

ly berried them out of pity! Are you angry because of that, Henriette?"

"I am angry because she is English, and her boy is English, and yet they are allowed to live among us as if they were French. I tell you they will be traitors when the time for treachery comes!"

Jeems had stood with his fingers clenched at the unyielding iron of the knocker. Now he heard another voice and knew it was Tontout's.

"I think Jeems' mother is nice," she said. "But Jeems is a detestable little English beast!"

"And some day that beast will help to cut our throats," added her mother unpleasantly.

The great iron knocker fell with a crash, and almost before the sound of it reached a servant's ears, the door swung open and Jeems stalked in. The women were speechless as he stood in the wide opening to the room in which they were seated. He scarcely seemed to realize they were there and looked only at Tontout. He remained for a moment without movement or speech, his slim figure tense and gripped. Then he bowed his head in a courtesy which Catherine had carefully taught him. When he spoke his words were as calm as those of Madame Tache had been.

"I have come to tell you I am sorry because of what happened at Lussan's place, Tontout," he said, and he bent his head a little lower toward her. "I ask you to forgive me."

Even Henriette Tontout could not have thought of him as a beast after that, for pride and fearlessness were in his bearing in spite of the whiteness of his face. As the occupants of the room stared at him, unable to find their voices, he drew back quietly and was gone as suddenly as he had appeared. The big door closed behind him, and turning to a window near her Tontout saw him go down the steps. An exclamation of indignation and amazement came at last from her mother, but this she did not hear. Her eyes were following Jeems.

He went across the open air into the fields. As he drew near the foot of Tontout hill, Odd came cautiously forth to meet him, but not until they reached their old resting place at the crest of the ascent did he pause or seem to notice the dog. Then he looked back upon the seigneurie. A bit of iron had sunk into his soul. His eyes were seeing with a new and darker vision. From the rich valley which had been the fount of all his dreams they turned to the faint gleam of distant water in the south where lay Lake Champlain, and beyond which, not far away, were the Mohawks and the English and the land of his mother's people. It was the blood of that land, running red and strong in his veins, which Tontout and her mother hated.

He dropped a hand upon Odd's head, and the two started over the homeward trail. The dog watched the forest and caught its scent, but he watched and guarded alone, for Jeems gave small heed to the passing interests of the woods and thickets.

Late spring, then the beginning of summer, followed Hepsibah's arrival at the Bulains home, and still he gave no betrayal of the restlessness which preaged his usual disappearance for another long period into the fastnesses of the world. This season of the year was always one of torment for the forest dwellers because of the winged pests which crawled the earth and filled the air, and Jeems had come to dread it as an indescribable nightmare of discomfort and suffering.

From the first of June until the middle of August, such plagues of mosquitoes bred and multiplied in the swamps and lowlands and woods that beasts were half devoured alive and the pioneers literally fought for their own existence, smothering their incursions, covering their flesh with hog fat and bear grease, and resorting to every known subtlety that night might snatch a little sleep at night. Within a few days, it seemed to Jeems, a world that had been a paradise of flowers, of sweet scents, of ripening fruits and delicious air was transformed into a hell of insect life which shut out travel in all directions and which invested with poisonous torture every spot where it was not partly subjugated by fire and smoke. The timber was heavy and dark, swamps were undrained, rivers and lakes were shadowed by dense vegetation, and in the humid, swarming mold of these places, the malevolent pestilence was born and rose in clouds that sometimes obscured the face of the moon. During these weeks a cordon of decayed stumps and logs smoldered night and day about the Bulains cabin, screening it from insect smoke, and outside this small haven, work on the farm was continued at a price of physical martyrdom, except under a burning sun, when the insects sought refuge from the glare and heat.

Smartly Frocked in Pretty Prints

notched dots. Coin-spot crepes, by the way, of every coloring are ever so chic. These are often used in reverse such as pink dots on black in combination with black dots on pink. White motifs scattered on blue, black, brown or green grounds are also highlighted in the printed silk mode.

The above applies for the most part to tailored crepes, for when it comes to evening and garden-party types the flatter flower chiffons still hold sway, the most noticeable feature about the frocks made of them being that their skirts nearly reach the ankle which together with semitransparent bodices, which are belted at the waistline, and intricacy of floating draperies and graceful capelets about the shoulders form the basis of design for the majority of these enchanting styles.

Most every printed frock whether of formal or informal type is supposed to have its own jacket. Of even more importance is the two-jacket dress, which is to say that the dress has a jacket of its own self-same material as well as one of monotone crepe or taffeta, or that which is of infinite attractiveness—a jacket of transparent velvet in some one or other of this season's enchanting colors.

These cunning jackets are often styled very simply and quaintly. Then again, especially for ultra formal evening wear they glory in sophisticated details which involve elaborate shirring and tucking and various other complicated treatments.

TREND TO LIGHT WOOLENS FOR FALL

Special interest is attached to the early fall fabrics because of their variety in color and weave. Lightweight woollens of every type have succeeded the heavy stiff weaves of years ago, writes a Paris fashion correspondent in the 'New York Times'. Three groups are shown for coats and suits. One includes an assortment of rough, pebbly woollens of featherweight that Schiaparelli, Bergu and Bruyere will present in their sports and topcoats for travel. These are woven in solid colors and mixtures, in dark tones of brown, green and wine. A new shade is blue fox, which is delightfully accented by trimming with fur of the same name.

A new phase in tweeds is a weave in "conservative" yarn-dyed effects in simple, small patterns combining dark colors with beige. They are also seen in the solid rich tones of greens, browns and reds.

More lightweight woollens than have been shown in some time will be used this season for dresses, ensembles and wraps. These in wool crepes, finely woven, are being used by the French couturiers in their advance collections.

Canton crepe-faille, a heavy silk of dull surface, will be very fashionable for both daytime and evening. The colors in which it will be seen are named in the order of their popularity—brown, olive green, yellowish in tone, copper-beech, red-brown, seal-brown and bronze. The new silvery bronze is a heavenly shade in which Chanel is making some striking afternoon and evening gowns.

Corduroy Sports Skirts

Are Easily Laundered

Designed to wear with the slip-on or knit shirt the corduroy or chambray jacket is a skirt of white corduroy, practical because it is washable. An attractive ensemble for such active sports as golf combines a dark flannel skirt with a pastel colored suede cardigan, a belt to match the skirt and a scarf of striped jersey in the two colors.

Late Paris Wrap Will Fit in Milady's Purse

A late fall in daytime wraps in Paris is a jacket small enough to put in milady's purse.

The jackets are tiny affairs of soft crepe or wool, generally sleeveless and falling only a few inches lower than the shoulder blades.

They generally match the gown in color and may be tucked into the purse when the wearer wishes to discard them.

Sheer Ninon Used for Milady's Summer Gown

Distinctly Empire in feeling is this afternoon gown of sheer Ninon. It is worn over a taffeta slip which is gathered at the hem petticoat-wise and which is a few inches longer than the dress.

Printed Crepe, Chiffon or Georgette Favored

Solid colors and contrasts come and go, but the royal favorite for summer afternoons and evenings as seasons pass is the printed crepe, georgette or chiffon frock. And by reason of the shadowy colorings, designs for dressy frocks grow large and larger. Even cabaret gowns look "swell" when soft tones are imposed on light backgrounds. Something new is a rose print on white in soft yellow, with hint of black. It suggests a frock fitting a golden blond, or a very deep brunette. It might even be worn by a brown-haired lass.

Gravure prints are very alluring for the young and mature when in the chiffons and artificial silk voiles. Such patterns are equally as charming as silks like flat crepe, which incidentally is a popular fabric with textile designers for summer afternoon and evening dresses.

Immunize All Pigs to Prevent Cholera

Advisable to Apply Treatment Before Weaning.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Swine growers in localities where there is danger of hog cholera may prevent future losses in their herds by immunizing the spring pigs against the disease, says Dr. T. P. White, veterinarian of the bureau of animal industry, United States Department of Agriculture. Even if hog cholera has never occurred on the immediate premises, there is always a possibility that infection may be introduced into the herd through various channels when the disease exists anywhere in the neighborhood.

Pigs from immune sows have a degree of natural immunity against cholera, but this protection lasts only while they obtain all their nourishment from the sow. It gradually diminishes as the pigs grow and by the time they are weaned the immunity has entirely disappeared. It is therefore advisable to apply the treatment before the pigs are weaned in order to insure protection against the disease. The pigs are more easily handled at that age and the cost of immunization is considerably less than when they are older and larger.

Guard Against Injury Done by Common Worms

Corn ear worms are so common in this country that most farmers do not consider it worth while to make efforts to fight them, but tests conducted by the United States Department of Agriculture show that ears with long, tight husks suffer less than half as much injury as ears having short, loose husks.

Ears with long, tight husks are characteristic in some varieties, the department says, but there is enough variation in all varieties for a farmer to select for seed only ears with long, tight husks. In this way he can build up a strain having better husk characteristics.

Even tight husks are also good protection from other insect pests of corn, such as the corn weevil, in sections where corn is stored in the husks. This is an additional reason for farmers to select their corn in the field, where they can give proper consideration to the type of husk.

Avoid Beetle Injury to Young Asparagus Plants

Beetle injury to young asparagus shoots may be avoided by cutting the crop clean every three to five days. In this way all the eggs deposited on the shoots will be removed before they hatch or soon afterwards. All volunteer plants should be destroyed and it will often pay to have a few here and there uncultivated to serve as a trap on which the beetles will congregate, feed, and lay their eggs. Here they may be poisoned with calcium arsenate and removed. After the cutting season, plants may be protected from beetle injury by two or three applications of calcium-arsenate or lead arsenate dust, 5 pounds mixed with 83 pounds of hydrated lime.

The use of poultry for the destruction of the beetle is practiced with good results in some localities.

Control of Weeds Most Important With Flax

The control of weeds is probably one of the most important things to consider in growing flax, says the Iowa State college. That is also one reason why newly broken soil free from weeds has generally been used.

Now that wilt-resistant varieties have been developed, wilt-free soil is only essential from the standpoint of weed control. In the last few years several large-seeded, wilt-resistant varieties have been isolated—Bison, Buda and Rio. Last year the Bison variety surpassed all other large-seeded varieties in the Iowa experiments. The Bison variety appeared particularly well adapted to early planting, the April 30 seeding yielding highest.

Farm Hints

Agriculture is the foundation of all business.

Keep each colony queen right continuously throughout the breeding season.

Experiments show rape to have about the same value as a hog pasture as red clover.

Haphazard exchange of seed frequently leads to a wider spread of disease, weeds and insects.

There is no substitute in farm products for quality and the American buying public is willing to pay well for it.

Give the asparagus bed a dressing of good fertilizer. It won't hurt it to salt it but it won't do any particular good and besides it is a waste of salt.

A layer of broken stone or gravel 3 or 4 inches thick, placed under a concrete floor will prevent dampness and moisture from coming through the floor.

Alfalfa meal is about the best source of vitamins for pigs in dry lot. A small amount daily of some green crop, such as kale, can also be used to advantage.

RED MITES

(By Prof. H. D. Munroe)

Many times during the summer we have poultry troubles that seem to be unanswerable. No worms, no coccidiosis—the birds just don't do well. The hen flock is not laying well; the pullets don't eat well. We think of all the mysterious diseases we ever heard about and start treating the birds for everything. Many times it is not the birds we should work on.

A flock of poultry, living in a hen house infested with mites, will not do well. The poultry mite is a blood sucker. They work at night when the birds are on the roost. They are the bed bug of the chicken. Fight them continually all summer.

Painting the roost every two weeks with used crank-case oil will eliminate this source of trouble. Don't dilute this crank-case oil with kerosene. Put it on thick. There are many commercial preparations on the market that will do a good job and will not have to be used so often.

BALITZ

Albert A. Balitz was born in Toledo, Ohio, on March 13, 1912.

Since May 25, 1925 he and a younger sister, Erma, have been children in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Balitz of Spencerville.

The tragic end of his mortal life at the age of 19 years, 4 months and 13 days occurred on Sunday afternoon, July 26th about four o'clock when he drowned suddenly in Adams Lake near South Milford, where his Sunday School class was meeting for the day.

He is survived by Mr. and Mrs. Frank Balitz, two sisters and one brother: Erma Balitz of Spencerville, and Donald and Catherine of Port Huron, Michigan.

His character of uprightness and wholesome humor, together with his willing and active disposition made for him many friends in school, community and church, where he was active in his right place. We shall miss his personality among us, and we shall miss his contributions in our church activities.

The funeral service was held on Wednesday morning conducted by Rev. G. D. Stoll, assisted by Rev. Homer Studabaker. Burial was made in White City cemetery.

Her home was her castle, her whole life was spent to make that home pleasant for her loved ones.

"MOTHER"

Adella Pope Branham
Mother, Rest,
With thy work well done,
Now it is set of sun.
Gently the tired hands fold—
Over the bosom cold—
Over the heart now stilled.
For thee thy Master willed Rest.

Mother, Sleep,
Through the hush of years,
Unknown to sob or tears.
Oh, 'tis a pleasant lot,
Bidding where time is not;
Safe from all fear's alarms
Held in Earth's mother-arms.
Sleep.

Mother, Wake,
In the south's sweet home,
There 'neath the gilded dome.
Thine by the Tree of Life
Unmarred by pain or strife—
Where shadows never fall,
So at the Master's call,
Wake.

WORK NEAT GAME

A neat game was worked in Bryan, DeKalb and Ney last week which netted the promoters a substantial amount at the cost of the merchants. At the three places these missionaries of neat had an advance man who dropped in a place, where he left a punch board, something of a baseball game, which was played on a five to one, ten to one or twenty to one basis. Here he left the punch board saying that he would be back in a short time and if it was not wanted would pick it up. Some time after that two men dropped in, observed the punch board and played it with large sums, winning of course. In DeKalb $80 was obtained in this fashion it was said; in Ney a smaller sum, and in Bryan $37.

Mrs. Fred Hart is visiting relatives at Fremont, Mich., and Robert Hart is at Birmingham, Mich., until next Tuesday.

Enraged South African Natives on the Warpath

Two thousand furious natives in South Africa, armed with assegais, went on the warpath to avenge the death of members of their tribe. They were attacked by Amabomvu braves in the dead of night at a wedding feast in the Mamo location, near Kranskop, Natal. The avengers burned down huts within 100 yards of Kranskop and the police were seriously alarmed. Europeans living in the neighborhood concentrated in a central farmhouse in case further trouble should arise. Some of the South African tribesmen are shown armed with assegais.

MY NEIGHBOR SAYS—

GET a cheap teapot to melt paraffin in and always keep it for this purpose. Once tried, you will never do without it. The melted paraffin pours easily just where it is wanted and need not be used all at one time.

Keep loose matches in a covered tin box or covered glass jar. Around outside of jar paste a strip of sandpaper on which to scratch matches.

Old phonograph records are excellent to keep irons polished. Rub iron over record occasionally.

When hardwood floors are worn, give a coat of white shellac the day before waxing. Floors will then be more easily polished.

Gilt frames can be cleaned with the white of an egg gently rubbed on with a camel's hair brush.

Fruit juices should always be saved. Combined with tapioca, which does not have to be soaked, or with gelatin, which is not flavored, they make delicious desserts.

To remove the shell of an egg quickly after it has boiled the required time, place it in a basin of cold water for two seconds and the shell will come off without difficulty.

When boiling ham, salt beef or tongue, which is to be eaten cold, you should leave the meat in the liquor until it is cold. The flavor is very much improved.

Large sheets that have become worn in the middle should be torn in halves and what were the two outer edges joined together. The shabby part, which is now outside, should be trimmed away and the raw edges neatly hemmed.

When cleaning gloves, ribbons, etc., with gasoline try this way: Take a pan or pail of hot water out of doors and warm the gasoline by placing the can in the water. Then take a piece of white soap and after wetting with gasoline whatever is to be cleaned, apply it and use the soap and work gasoline as if it were water. The warm gasoline is much pleasanter for the hands, and with the soap washes cleaner.

The best thing with which to rub irons is a fairly large pad of folded brown paper. This will also serve to test their heat. In addition a cloth should be kept at hand on which to wipe off any flakes of soot or dirt. A small piece of wax is excellent for producing a gloss when rubbed on the iron. Paraffin has the same effect.

Arlington Bridge Open, but Only for Polo Ponies

Although work is not yet complete on the Arlington Memorial bridge over the Potomac at Washington, a specially privileged class of traffic is now using it. But it is not official limousines which pass over it, but polo ponies, used by army officers and stabled at Fort Myer, which use the new span so their slow cavalcade will not delay traffic on the heavily crowded Highway bridge.

LIGHTS OF NEW YORK

By WALTER TRUMBULL

There is a New York woman—wealth and position who never has had a high regard for regulations of the order which appear to her a bit stupid and unnecessary. Up to recent times, of course, men have made laws and women have made customs, and the fact is that the average woman, being really much more independent of thought than any man, is governed mainly by her own sense of the fitness of things rather than by any legal code. That may not be clear to you, but I know what I mean.

At any rate, for various reasons, this woman had not been abroad in rather a long time, but decided to spend a season in Europe. She discovered that she had to obtain a passport.

KNOW HIS WIFE

"The mistress says she will be ready in five minutes."
"All right, I'm going to lie down for a while. Call me in an hour and a half."

Used to special consideration, she did not see why she had to take out such a document, she being a nice person whom any country should be glad to entertain, and, if she did have to take it out, she didn't see why there was so much red tape to be unraveled. Finally she got the passport and showed it to her husband. He, being a man, was considerably startled when he looked it over.

"This picture is you, all right," he said, "but they must have made a mistake. The description doesn't fit you in the least. Your eyes, for example, are light blue. This describes them as hazel."

"Yes," said his wife calmly. "I always have wanted hazel eyes."
"What has that got to do with it?" said the man. "Your eyes are blue."
"Don't be silly," said his wife. "When they insisted upon my describing myself, I thought of just how I had always wished to look, so I just pretended I looked that way. It's a very good description."

When last seen, the husband looked as if he were about to have apoplexy.

It has become really dangerous to sit around with your friends. A lot of them appear to have succumbed to an educational complex. They want you to play spelling games, one of those games where somebody mentions a letter, and the next one adds a letter, and so on around the room until somebody completes the word. When you complete a word, you drop out. In the first place, certain of my friends have charged that I keep my spelling in my wife's name, and in the second place, I don't like spelling games and never did. And, if they don't start a spelling game, they begin on definitions. That's just as bad. Who cares about the difference between biennial and biannual? And, by the way, what does "molester" mean?

The KITCHEN CABINET

VARIETY IN THE MENU

For a luncheon menu after preparing the salad of crisp lettuce, french dressing with a few sections of grapefruit or pineapple, sprinkle it with a handful of good nuts—peanuts, almonds, pecans or hickory nuts—any nut will be good and use as a border around the edge of the pepper for a more fancy and nutritious dish.

Use the fruit left in the bag when draining for jelly to make jam. If carefully looked over and the fruit is fresh, it will make most acceptable jam. By adding an orange, a few nuts, one will have a nice tasty conserve.

(© 1931, Western Newspaper Union.)

remove the seeds and veins. Scald with boiling water and drain well. Fill with the creamed fish, cover with buttered crumbs and place the peppers in gem pans to hold their shape. Bake ten minutes or until well heated and the crumbs well browned. Salmon, tuna or cooked fresh fish well seasoned may be used in place of the haddock. Garnish with rice, hard-boiled eggs and chop the whites and use as a border around the edge of the pepper for a more fancy and nutritious dish.

French Potato Soup.—This has appeared before, but is such a favorite that one hopes to find a few new ones to become its advocates. Slice a large potato or two, an onion or two—one may vary the proportions depending on the number to be served. Slice the onions and put them to cook in two tablespoonsful of butter. When a golden brown add them to the potatoes which are covered with boiling water, cook until soft. Season, add hot milk and serve.

Creamed Fennel Haddock.—There should be one and one-half cupsful of the fish, flake or break into small bits, after soaking in water. Remove all bone and skin. Make a white sauce as usual, add the fish and simmer for ten minutes. Halve crosswise large, fresh, green peppers and

The Land of Milk

Patty just didn't like milk. One bright sunny day she sat in the garden playing. A big fat bee droned by and settled on a nearby blossom. Soon two more joined him.

"What a funny buzzing sound they make," thought Patty. "Wouldn't it be funny to be a bee and fly from flower to flower looking for honey? Then I wouldn't have to drink milk, or do anything at all but fly around and buzz and buzz."

Just then she noticed some one walking about under the trees. He seemed to be wringing his hands and looking for some one. He looked like a great big Milk Bottle. "But he can't be," mused Patty, "because Milk Bottles don't have legs and arms and heads. And besides he's talking."

He was quite near now and Patty saw the troubled look on his face and could hear distinctly what he was saying. "I wonder where she is, and I wonder why she doesn't like me when I like her so much." Then, catching sight of Patty, he hurried toward her.

"Patty dear," he called, "won't you come and play with me?" He really was a Milk Bottle, and because his arms were short he had a hard time reaching for his cap. He tipped it over so little.

"I'm glad he didn't bow," thought Patty, "he'd spill if he did." Aloud she said, "Go away, please. I don't like you."

"How do you know that you don't like me? Let me introduce some of my friends to you."

And sure enough there they were. They looked like Brownies; some were brown, some blue, some white and some red.

"My friends," he began in a very important tone of voice, "this is Patty. Tell her what you can do for her."

Then taking hold of hands they danced near and Patty noticed that they were lettered A, B, C, and D. They took off their caps, bowed low before her and said, "We are the Vitamins."

"Keeping eyes well and strong," sang A.

"Scaring illness away," cried B. "Making you grow," sang out C. And D in a high-pitched, squeaky voice piped, "Plenty of me, strong bones will be."

All this time four little blue ones had been whispering off to one side, with their heads together. Not until they faced her did she notice that they had their names written on white strips of paper, too.

"I'm Iron," said the first one, "and very important!"

"I'm Phosphorus," said another, standing beside little Iron.

"I like your teeth firm and strong," sang gay Calcium, dancing into place.

And then Sulphur pulled his cap down over one eye, and with his hands in his pockets and his feet spread very wide apart, squeaked in his queer little voice, "I'm here, too, and my work is important for you."

Patty laughed until her sides ached at the way they fell over each other when they tried to form a pin-wheel.

One little odd red Brownie bowed before Patty as the others had done.

"I am Protein, a perfect building-block for you, Patty!" And then he pulled his little red cap down tight on his head and turned cartwheels until he was quite out of breath.

All the while Mr. Milk Bottle smiled and nodded and looked very much pleased. By this time, too, Patty was feeling very much ashamed of the way she had spoken to him when he first came up to her. "Oh, Mr. Milk Bottle," she apologized with her prettiest smile, and her very deapest curtsy, "I do like you, and I do like your friends. They are all so happy and gay and so very polite. Won't you come to see me often?"

"We will come as often as you want us to," he smiled, "we live in every glass of milk you drink."

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"AS SIMPLE AS COLUMBUS' EGG"

Here is a phrase, as old as the discovery of America, and one which would probably never have come into the language but for this epochal incident.

The expression had its inspiration in the court of the queen of Spain who had invited scientists and others to stand on an egg on one of its ends—a balancing feat hitherto, presumably unaccomplished.

None could do the trick till Columbus, with an air of nonchalance tapped it on the table, held it for a moment and then gently released his hold, when it balanced itself neatly and completely.

Ever since, any problem which is apparently puzzling but in reality simple has been referred to as being as simple as Columbus' egg.

Immortal "Will's" Father

Fearful Process Servers

Prosecution of Councillor Cox, of Manchester, for not attending church on Sunday, was founded on the Sunday Observance act of 1677. But the law of England about compulsory church observance was the same a hundred years earlier, when Shakespeare's father was reported to the Stratford authorities "for not coming to church to Church according to his Majesty's laws."

But it was not lack of piety so much as lack of pelf that kept John Shakespeare away from the parish church. For in the record, there is this note appended to his name and the names of eight other offenders: "It is sayde that these laste nine com not to Church for feare of process for debte."

It was on September 25, 1502, that this record was made—just a year before the publication of "Venus and Adonis," described by Shakespeare in his dedication as "The first heire of my invention."—London Morning Post.

MINERALS IN CATTLE FEEDING

(By Dr. John M. Evvard)

In the fattening of cattle it has been our experimental experience that the feeding of properly selected minerals has been a paying proposition.

The addition of from one-half to an ounce or more of minerals per head daily, the allowance depending upon the weight of the cattle and character of ration fed resulted in a greater daily gain, a more uniform feeding record with less "off feed" disturbances, a better finish at the end of the fattening period, a greater selling value per hundred weight, and a larger margin per head fed this over and above feed costs.

Surely these advantages accru-ing from the feeding of a well compounded mineral mixture carrying the elements most likely to be lacking in cattle feeding rations, or namely: calcium, phosphorus, iron, copper and iodine should appeal to even the hardest minded. After all, a great many so-called tough minded or conservative cattle feeders have in recent years tried out the "mineral way" of feeding, and a very large percentage of these experimenters have been won over to mineral feeding because of good results secured.

In fact, considering all the phases of live stock production, the mineral feeders in cattle production are somewhat akin to the mineral feeders in swine raising, because both classes of feeders
"stay put" that is, they "stay put with minerals in their feeding program." They have learned from the profitable experience that the feeding of properly selected minerals pays good dividends.

COMFORT
...costs so little

THE COST of ELECTRIC service comfort is so low that no family need "scrimp" on this item in the budget.

You must burn a 50 watt lamp at least two hours to add one cent to your bill while a 25 watt lamp runs four hours for a penny.

An ELECTRIC range does your cooking for one cent a meal per person and produces delicious scientifically cooked food with automatic regularity. In summer you "cook with cold" in your ELECtric refrigerator. Even when it runs, steadily for one hour while you are freezing a dessert the cost, with a medium size machine, is about one cent. Half an hour with the vacuum cleaner will spruce up the house and you have added but a penny to your bill.

Run your ELECTRIC fan when you are warm. It operates for an hour at a cost of one-half cent. Truly, it takes a lot of comfort to run up an ELECTRIC bill. It is the smallest item on the family budget and costs less today than it did in pre-war days.

BUDGET INDICATES RAISE IN COUNTY TAXES

The budget prepared for publication by County Auditor Frank E. Lyon provides for an increase in the county tax rate for 1932 of 4 cents on the $100 valuation.

The levy for 1931 was 52 cents, but, unless the county council when it meets September 8 sees fit to make a change, the rate will be 56 cents in 1932. It is generally hinted that the council has good claims for slashing the proposed budget in many instances, and taxpayers are asking members of the County Council to use special precaution this year.

The raise is made necessary by the expense of the general election to be held next year, estimated at $10,500, and the payment of the salary of the prosecuting attorney, $1,800, as provided by a new law passed last winter. The latter disbursement will entirely or largely be refunded to the county in prosecutors' fees.

The general fund levy is to be increased from 28 to 32 cents, according to the budget. The gravel road repair rate, however, is to be reduced from 14 cents to 10 cents. This will produce about $16,000 less for this department. The estimated income from the 10 cent levy will be $41,000. To this will be added about $30,000 in gasoline tax.

It will be necessary to raise the county road bond fund levy from 10 to 14 cents, Mr. Lyon reports. Final payments of the bonds for the Auburn-Newville road and the Botts road were made this year, but the county must begin next year to pay for the St. Joe-Spencerville paving and the Waterloo-Hamilton road improvement. The bonds to be paid and the interest for these two roads will be $27,000 the first year.

The additional appropriations for 1931 sought at the coming session of the council include $10,000 for poor relief. The disbursement for this purpose this year has increased tremendously. Last year it was only $8,875, but it will reach about $18,000 this year. This money is eventually returned to the county by the respective townships.

The additional appropriations proposed also include $13,000 for a payment on the paving of state road 27 south of Garrett. This allowance has been under advisement for some time.

CLIFFTON DRAGGOO HELD UP IN STORE

A daring hold up at the Dell Draggo store at Concord was staged Friday evening at about 9:30, resulting in the loss of about $12.

Cliffton Draggo and George Snyder were the only two persons in the store when it was walked to by two men with guns, and ordered them to "stick 'em up," and hand over the cash.

The cash had been taken from the register and put in the sack, amounting to the above mentioned sum.

There were three men in the gang, one remaining in the car for quick getaway. It seems that the car had passed the store going south and turned around at the Roy Gibford home and then back to the store.

Officials have no trace of the bandits as yet. Dell Draggo was in St. Joe at the time of the holdup.

Ed Leighty, after many years of grocery business, will close his retail store next month, and Donald Kinsey expects to move his restaurant there.

Ed first started as clerk in the Sol Barney store, later going into the H. C. Hathaway store. He then purchased the Hathaway business and after some weeks moved into the quarters where he is now located.

For a neat well arranged stock of goods Ed always displayed exceptional taste. He is undecided as to what he will follow when out of his store.

OUR WASHINGTON FAMILY WRITES THE NEWS

1446 N. St. N. W.
Washington, D. C. 8-11-1931.

Dear friends:

I had declared a "moratorium," on letter writing owing to busy torrid days but now that it is cooler, I too have taken a new lease on life. Not being on the regular staff of the "News" I need not study the psychology of "my public"; neither do I need to consider our reaction to what I write; at that I trust the Editor will lose no subscriptions because of this letter which he so indulgently solicited.

In regard to Washington's climate: "It isn't so hot!" As that expresses a lengthy paragraph, please pardon the slang. However, with the mercury from ninety to one hundred degrees for weeks and weeks and now after the rain, sixty-eight, I could say nothing else anyway.

We are enjoying the Capital but the scenery here would be greatly enhanced by the presence of you, our good old friends. I suppose you are so attached to the new paved road that none of you will try out the highways that lead to Washington this summer. In our dreams we sit in the porch-swing back home and watch the rest of the world glide by on that new pavement.

In reality, we daily wend our way thru traffic which usually is more or less congested. You know sight-seeing is only a secondary matter with us—earning our bread by the sweat of "my" brow is the primary object of our sojourn here. We have been so grateful for the privilege afforded us to know this city better.

To the nature lover who asked me if I missed my garden I reply emphatically in the affirmative. As a gardener, I was just an amateur but I enjoyed the vegetables and flowers and as I worked with them I received much mental stimulation and spiritual insight. I like the philosophy of life one gleams from nurturing the green growing things from seed to maturity; the well-kept garden teaches valuable lessons as does also the neglected one and I believe every one should have a patch of earth in which to dig—and then perhaps there would be less mud-aling.

"The kiss of the sun for pardon, The song of the birds for mirth, You are nearer God's heart in a garden, Than anywhere else on earth."

That, I am told, is the inscription on a stone by a bird bath at the Singing Tower (in Florida) Edward Bok's gift to the American people. Isn't it something to think about? There are acres of beautiful parks and gardens here and had we missed seeing Washington in the Springtime we would have missed much of its beauty.

The 1930 Census is still keeping me busy. The Census Bureau is said to be the largest statistical office in the world and as such it has a very proper and necessary function in the life of our nation. You should write for some of its publications. I have not had a glimpse of the schedules I secured as Census Enumerator in St. Joe and Concord Township, but strange as it may seem out of approximately twenty million schedules, into my hands came the ones from my old home town, Fostoria Ohio. I felt like Rip Van Winkle as I checked up on my childhood friends and schoolmates among whom I had grown up and among whom later I was a school ma'am. Needless to say it was impossible for me to concentrate on my work and after the unique "visit" with my friends I was glad when those folios were completed. In working the various states I have found nearly all of your surnames, and frequently a duplication of the entire name. To be sure, I have learned how old Ann is but I dare not tell and why didn't some one ask me, to list names for the twins? Have not seen any babies named "Depression" but there will be some in the next Census surely for some parents seem merciless indeed in choosing names. Ursula cake and Ima Kidder are very mild in comparison to some of the names recorded. Perhaps you thought it was just a newspaper story (pardon the insinuation Mr. Editor) about children being named Finis but it is a fact.

And now that is a story that has no end and I must sign off as I fear you are ready to dial a new station.

Cordially yours,
Mabelle Thornton.

EFFECTS OF HOT WEATHER ON DAIRY HERDS

On the account of the extremely hot weather, poor pasture, and flies, the cows in the DeKalb and Steuben D. H. I. A. did not do nearly as good as they did in June. There were 13 cows in the association that produced over 50 pounds of butterfat for the month.

Mr. S. S. Butler of Hudson, Ind., had high cow for the month. Princess Mary, a pure bred Jersey of his produced 1001 pounds of milk and 82.1 pounds of butterfat for the month. For the past three months this cow has made a remarkable record. For the months of May, June and July, she has produced an average of one thousand, one hundred and one (1,101) pounds of milk and 73.8 pounds of butterfat monthly. Mr. Butler also had high herd for the month of July. His eight P. B. Jerseys produced an average of 634 pounds milk and 39.6 pounds B. F. for the month.

Larry Brandon & Son had second high herd for the month. His 12 Jersey cows produced an average of 835 pounds milk and 36.7 pounds B. F. for the month. Milo Provines had the high 2 yr. old heifer for July. His Sadie heifer produced 837 pounds milk and 51.9 pounds B. F.

There are 358 cows in the association and they had an average of 558 pounds of milk and 26.8 pounds B. F. for the month.

LITTLE ROCK GARDENS IN A MODEST DOORYARD

A rock garden lover who has small grounds in which to realize his dream is in luck in several ways.

To make much of a showing on a large estate, such a garden must be elaborate; it must cover considerable ground; and, to accomplish anything worth while, it is an expensive proposition. In a modest dooryard, however, only a small rock garden is appropriate; often delightful results can be brought about without great outlay of time or money. Perhaps its greatest appeal is in the fact that within a small space many dainty plants can be grown that would be lost in a border planting or in a large garden.

There are certain secrets that will help to bring charm to any rock garden. In the first place, it should be as natural as possible and in proportion with its surroundings; it should not be a miniature. It should be so much a part of the place that it will seem to have grown right out of its setting. And, its plants should be those that live naturally in rocky crevices and nooks.

Lights of New York

By WALTER TRUMBULL

Frederick S. Dellenbaugh, who lives just down the street from me, is one of the only two living survivors of Major J. W. Powell's second expedition through the Grand canyon of the Colorado, which, by the way, is in Arizona. The other survivor is Capt. F. M. Bishop of Salt Lake City. It took the party two years to make that trip in oaken boats 22 feet long, made in Chicago and shipped over the Union Pacific to Green River, Wyo.

While on that trip, the cook taught young Fred Dellenbaugh to make biscuits. One day, he was left to take care of the camp by the river bed while the remainder of the party climbed 3,000 feet up the side of the canyon. He promised to have some biscuits ready on their return, but in going over the provisions came across a bag of coffee, which the cook had ground. Mr. Dellenbaugh then decided on a surprise.

He had heard of "coffee cake" and determined to make some. Fixing the dough as he would for biscuits, he mixed with it a plentiful supply of the ground coffee, moulded it into the shape of a cake, and baked it in an oven he constructed. In addition, he used some sugar, with the result that the cake retained every thumb-mark as clearly as would a good grade of putty.

When the party returned, hungry and tired, the cook took one look at the cake, stirred up the fire, and wearily reached for the bacon and potatoes. But Mr. Dellenbaugh was not to be discouraged. He later made a cake flavored with one bottle of lemon extract taken on the trip, which was pronounced a great success. The

Samo San's Toothbrush

At night or in the morning or right after meals, or any other time you brush your teeth to keep them pretty and white, look at your toothbrush, and think of children in far away lands.

You'd never guess what kind of a toothbrush boys and girls of old Japan used hundreds of years ago. Just a small stick of bamboo with the fibers at one end frayed out like a brush! With this funny affair little Samo San of old Japan would rub and polish her teeth until they were as clean as she could get them.

Gahiz, the Arab boy, uses a toothbrush, too. His is a queer little stick-brush somewhat like that of Samo San of old Japan. But Gahiz's "tooth-cleaner" is made of a twig of sweet-scented myrtle, or a lily root or a strip of palm wood. In Arabia it is considered so important to have clean teeth that it has become part of these people's religion. Little Gahiz not only brushes his teeth morning and evening and after meals, but also before he says his prayers. That's a pretty custom, don't you think so, to have a clean, sweet mouth with which to say one's prayers? So fond are the people of Arabia of their sweet-scented toothbrushes (sawaks, they call them) that they think them very nice presents, indeed, and often give each other cunning packets of them tied up with gay ribbons of gauze and silk.

Away down in Africa lives black Mahdi who is a caravan runner, and makes his living by carrying packages strapped to his naked black back, or balanced on top of his woolly, black head. He is strong and sturdy, and can trot for miles and miles down the jungle trails and can bear great loads. Because it's so hot in Mahdi's land he doesn't bother to wear any clothes. But two things he always carries with him—a big gourd for drinking water and his "masuki" or toothbrush. Mahdi's toothbrush is made from a piece of reed or a stalk cut from the bull-rushes along a stream. As it doesn't cost him anything at all, he gets a new one often, and always he keeps his teeth clean and shining.

All over the world children are keeping their teeth clean and white; are you?

My Neighbor

Says:

TO REMOVE brown rings that come on tea and coffee cups rub with salt moistened with water. They will soon disappear.

Kerosene lamps should be filled every day and the chimneys washed once a week. To insure a perfect light, let every lamp have a new wick once a month, and just before lighting rub the body or stand of the lamp carefully, so that all the smell of the oil is removed.

If furniture is rubbed the same way as the grain, it will polish much brighter and quicker.

When lighting a birthday cake use a taper. Light the candles in the middle first and those on the outside later.

Save all fruit parings. Put on to boil with water to cover for 10 to 15 minutes, and then strain. These juices make a foundation for delicious fruit drinks.

Salt meats, such as ham, tongue and beef, which are to be boiled, should be put in cold water and allowed to heat slowly.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"THE HUNGER STRIKE"

The hunger strike is not an uncommon maneuver on the part of prisoners who attempt to gain their freedom because of the desire on the part of governmental authorities to avoid having people die of starvation while in jail.

This practice originated in Russia in the Nineteenth century, where, on account of the terrible prison fare, it was probably not overdifficult to starve oneself to death.

What really brought this idea into world-wide prominence, however, was its practice in England by suffragettes, who were jailed on account of their efforts for enfranchisement of their sex—so recently as fifteen years ago.

Since then, there have been sporadic hunger strikes, practically all of them political prisoners both in the United States and abroad.

FOOD FOR CHILDREN

It is gratifying to learn that the growing child may eat almost everything that the older members of the family eat, if the food is simple, well-prepared and nutritious. For a simple dessert that the whole family may eat with impunity, try baked or steamed custards. Prepare them by using two eggs to a pint of milk, a pinch of salt, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, or honey and if all the teeth are good for grinding, add a tablespoonful of freshly-grated coconut for the top of each custard. Sprinkle with cinnamon or nutmeg and chill before serving. To cook, set the custard cups in a pan of water—not too deep to boil up and into the cups—and cook until just firm enough to be like heavy cream. Test with a knife in the center of each; if it comes out clean the custard is ready to remove from the heat. Take out of the water and place in cold water to chill.

We are allowed to give even the small child who has his grinding teeth fresh shredded cabbage as well as grated carrot. Bananas when well ripened are just as important as bread and carrots in the diet.

Cabbage with spaghetti is a different way of serving that good vegetable. To four cups of shredded cabbage take one and one-half cups of broken spaghetti, cook in boiling salted water until tender, then drain. Stir over the fire four tablespoonfuls of butter or any sweet fat, add four tablespoonfuls of flour, blend well and add two cups of milk; cook until smooth, season with salt to taste, adding a few dashes of cayenne and a cupful of snappy grated cheese. Arrange the cabbage and spaghetti in layers, covering with the sauce. Top with soft buttered crumbs and bake twenty to thirty minutes. Serve from the baking dish with a wreath of parsley as a garnish around the dish.

Man Resided Here 20,000 Years Ago

Life in North America Is Traced to Ice Age.

Pasadena, Calif.—The time man has lived in America was pushed back to at least 20,000 years ago by reports to the American Association for the Advancement of Science here recently. Archeologists and geologists told how they have read the record written in earth deposits that give strong evidence that highly developed man hunted strange red haired and large clawed ground sloths, primitive horses, buffaloes unlike those known to early white men or Indians, and other strange beasts. Man was contemporaneous with these creatures when the last great ice sheet of the glacial age still covered northern United States. That man existed at a time more remote than generally credited is the conclusion of leading authorities, including Dr. H. M. Harrington of the Southwest museum, Dr. Barnum Brown, of the American Museum of Natural History, and Dr. Chester Cole of the California Institute of Technology.

Scattered Over America. Doctor Harrington and Doctor Stock told of explorations of a gypsum cave near the site of Boulder dam in Nevada, where the camp fires, weapons, and torches of early man were found imbedded. They concluded that this early gypsum cave man, still known only from his tools, since none of his bones have been found, after two years of excavations, greatly strengthens scientific suspicion that man was widely scattered over America in the last stages of the ice age. This is a greater age for man in America than most scientists have considered possible heretofore.

At Pasaden, N. M., Dr. Barnum Brown found a kill of extinct buffalo made by man using stone weapons that are different from and superior to any hitherto discovered in America. He dated the deposit in which the bones were found as 20,000 years old.

Heat in the Stratosphere.

There is a possibility that instead of man being as ancient as these new discoveries indicate, the extinct animals associated with them existed until more recent times than scientists have proposed. This view was expressed by D. A. S. Homer of the University of Chicago. A report from Dr. Philip S. Smith of the United States geological survey showed that Alaska in the ice age was a pleasant place to be, and offered a good reason for primitive man to migrate across the narrow Bering strait from Asia to America.

Just a mere 50 miles above our heads the temperature is between 1,000 and 2,000 degrees Fahrenheit, according to a new theory of the earth's atmosphere presented by Prof. B. Guthenberg of the California Institute of Technology. This extremely hot weather a few miles up comes as the result of Professor Gutenberg's novel theory that the atmosphere is practically the same in composition throughout and not exclusively of helium in some high layers, as other physicists have concluded. Although the temperatures are high in the heights of the stratosphere, the air is very diffuse and thin. Only a rocket could actually penetrate the atmospheric heights to bring back evidence of what actually exists there. Professor Gutenberg said. The shells of a long range gun used by the Germans in bombarding Paris probably traveled in a highly heated region of thin atmosphere, but since they exploded it is not known how they were affected by the heat that they encountered.

Pittsburgh Population Is Outweighed by Soot

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Approximately 107,272,000 pounds of soot—an amount probably greater than the weight of the entire population of Pittsburgh—falls within the city limits during a year, it has been estimated. The soot falls at an average rate of 98.5 tons per square mile each year, according to H. B. Meller, head of the bureau of smoke regulation.

This is an average of 157 pounds for each resident of Pittsburgh. It was estimated, with the total probably exceeding the total weight of the population of about 700,000.

Comparative charts show a decrease of about 50 per cent in the sootfall in the downtown district in the past eight years which was attributed to use of central heating plants instead of a large number of individual furnaces.

The 1929-30 survey shows that less soot fell than in 1923-24 when the previous survey was made, but there still was more than in 1912-13.

DAIRY FINDS MILK COSTS FROM 11,000 COWS

Showing Difference Between Profit and Loss.

Declaring that the dairy herd improvement associations are often responsible for the difference between profit and loss in dairy farming, Ivan McKellop, extension specialist in animal husbandry at the Ohio State university, points out that the associations are making it easy to practice selective breeding, to eliminate low producers, and to feed individual cows according to their production records. Mr. McKellop states that last year the 11,000 Ohio cow in the dairy herd improvement associations averaged 7,507 pounds of milk and 822 pounds of butterfat. They made $138 above feed costs, which amounted to $93, and they produced a product worth $229.

The feed cost for 100 pounds of milk was $122 and the feed cost for producing one pound of butterfat was 28.8 cents. The average labor income from the average association cow was approximately $80 and the average labor income per hour per cow was about 60 cents.

According to dairy herd improvement figures, the dairy farmer milking an average herd of cows and getting the average market price for the milk is making only six cents an hour for the time he spends with his herd. This is 54 cents less per hour than the herd association member makes.

Dairy herd improvement associations, McKellop declared, have been operating in this state for the past 10 years. The Burnsville association in Belmont county is the oldest. It is no longer an experiment but a decided help in keeping yearly milk, butterfat, feed, and cost records on each cow in the association. Knowing each cow's production, these men have been able to increase the production of their cows in eight years from 270 pounds of butterfat to 360 pounds of butterfat.

As ordinarily conducted, he stated, a dairy herd improvement association is an organization of between 20 and 50 dairymen who co-operatively employ a man to keep production, feed, and income records of their cows.

Boutfours System of Feeding Dairy Cattle

Up in Canada, a practice that is attracting attention is the Boutfours system of feeding dairy cattle. This system calls for a material reduction in the total roughage fed and the elimination of succulent roughage. Under this system the dairy cow is not only fed a grain ration that is 5 or 6 per cent higher in protein than the common 18 per cent protein ration, but it includes a variety of protein rich feed, the theory being that the variety insures higher consumption of feed as well as rapid and economical gain.

Another feature of this system is a generous ration fed the dry cow for six weeks prior to freshening. This is called the "steaming up" process. Special attention is also given to the development of the calf and heifer, the object being to build a good machine by the use of lots of good roughage supplemented with the necessary grain.

Many dairymen are very skeptical of such a system because it is so different from the common methods. It is pointed out that the breeder has sought for big roomy cows capable of handling much feed. Advocates of this new system point out that even with big cows probably more bulk and fiber has been fed than they could utilize efficiently.

Grind the Roughage

The Maryland experiment station has conducted quite an extensive test on ground roughage. They report that cows fed on ground hay produced 131 per cent more milk and 4.84 per cent more butterfat than they did when fed on hay not ground. Cows refused nearly 80 per cent of the unground hay and refused only about 11 per cent of the ground hay. However, considering the cost of grinding the hay, the profit was negligible and not sufficient to recommend the practice.

On the other hand, of course, there have been some more favorable reports on the grinding of alfalfa. The Pennsylvania station reports that the nutrients in ground hay are slightly more digestible with the exception of crude fiber. The Walker-Gordon farms report rather favorably on their plan which is to draw alfalfa green, then to dry it artificially and grind it immediately. It is then stored in bags.

Cost of Cooling Milk

The New York State College of Agriculture kept some figures and where electricity cost four cents per kilowatt hour it cost 11.4 cents per can to cool milk with electricity and 18.7 per can to cool milk with ice. It should be remembered that the cost of cooling with ice is not all cash cost, a considerable proportion of the cost being represented by labor in harvesting and storing the ice. It requires about 8 per cent of a kilowatt hour of current per can of milk cooled.

CELTIC LANGUAGES CYMRIC AND GAELIC

Both Irish and Welsh are living languages. They belong to the Celtic group, as English belongs to the Teutonic group. Celtic languages are divided into two sections, the Cymric and the Gaelic. The Irish language, or Gaelic of Ireland, as well as the Scots' Gaelic and Manx come within the latter category, while the Welsh belongs to the Cymric group. The languages within each of these groups resemble one another closely, yet they present many important points of difference. The Welsh has an almost perfectly phonetic spelling, while the Irish spelling is historical and consequently does not give a true picture of its present pronunciation.

Irish (Gaelic of Ireland), which is more than two thousand years old, was perhaps the only language used in Ireland before the introduction of Christianity. Then came Latin, but it did not displace Gaelic. Gaelic remained the language of the people, and the English emigrants to Ireland learned to speak it. But Cromwell's accession to power marked the end of its supremacy. Under his laws the Irish had to become English in speech, thought and religion or become deprived of educational opportunities. The inhabitants of the Pale—a strip of territory on the eastern coast of the island nearest to England—took up English, but those outside of the Pale remained Irish and consequently had fewer educational advantages.

During the last half-century many attempts have been made to restore the ancient Irish language and culture, and Irish is now, under the Free State, the official language, although the English language is equally recognized. The Irish language is a compulsory subject in the schools, the Gaelic league carries on the work of teaching adults, and many other organizations endeavor to establish the habit of speaking Irish, so that it may permeate every aspect of social life. But it has not yet reached the daily or the senate; Irish is rarely, if ever, spoken in either of these two houses.

Welsh is the nearest sister tongue to Gaelic, and over a short stretch of sea is spoken by perhaps a million people. It is the language of church and chapel and produces a large crop of prose and poetry. It is the mother tongue of Lloyd George—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Polish Leader Hailed as Savior of Europe

Lord d'Abernon's tribute to Pilsudski as the real savior of Europe in 1920 has aroused much comment. The praise of the Polish leader appeared in the Gazette Polska on the tenth anniversary of the Polish victory against the Bolsheviks. Lord d'Abernon declared that contemporary history includes few events as important as the battle of the Vistula in 1920 and not one which has been less appreciated. If the Bolsheviks had won the day the battle would have marked a turning point in European history, for Central Europe would have been thrown open to admit a flood of Bolshevik propaganda. The Bolsheviks had much vaster plans than the occupation of Poland. Many German towns were ready to proclaim a Bolshevik regime as soon as Warsaw fell. Pilsudski's strategic genius, added the author, saved Poland, and in saving Poland saved Europe.

Desperate

The borrowing habit is not confined to the United States by any means. They actually do it in dear old London and are not in the least particular whom they borrow from. One of the big London daily papers carries a classified advertising section, somewhat similar to the Times "personals" in which English people of high and low degree air their troubles. It was in this column that the following ad recently appeared:

"Will the persons who have borrowed Waverley Novels No. 3, and Les Misérables Vol. I from Cliven-den library, kindly return same to Viscountess Astor, M. P."

One mentions in passing that the M. P. after Lady Astor's name does not stand for motion pictures nor mounted police, but member of parliament.

SUMMER LIGHTS

(By Prof. Paul G. Riley)
The demand for August, September and October eggs of good size and quality is always greater than the supply. Many poultrymen who get good production from their hens through these months report the greatest profit per hen of any period of the year.

The days are beginning to get short. The weather is hot, and it is difficult to keep total feed consumption of the laying flock at its height from now on until cool weather.

A great many poultrymen have discovered that the use of artificial light, beginning any time from August 1, to August 15, has been of real help in holding production. A generally accepted practice is to turn the lights on at about two-thirty to three o'clock in the morning and to keep them running until daylight. The reason this gives increased production is not because it gives a longer working day, as the days are still fairly long, but it gets the birds up early in the morning, when the weather is cool. This seems to increase the total daily feed consumption.

If it is desirable to use these hens for breeders, the lights should be turned off not later than November 1, which, of course, will cause a complete moult in the entire group of hens. Or, if egg production is the only thing that is desired, lights may be continued throughout the winter, gradually reducing the amount of light as the weather gets cool so that lights are going on at four o'clock in the morning.

A great many poultrymen have found that by using this practice they can maintain from thirty-five to sixty per cent production until well along in the winter and that this practice is profitable.

FROM INDIANA UNIVERSITY NEWS SERVICE

DuWayne Kinsey, Concord Twp. High School graduate, is among 94 high school graduates named here as a winner of county scholarships to Indiana University. Each scholarship covers contingent fees amounting to about $80 for the year. Eighty additional county scholarships are still open, according to Dean David A. Rothrock, and in view of the financial depression this year, all are likely to be filled. Value of the 184 county scholarships available is approximately $15,000.

County scholarships to the state university are awarded under an act of the 1919 legislature to stimulate interest in scholarship. Under the law, county superintendents are required to make their scholarship appointments strictly on a basis of high grades made during the entire high school course. Two scholarships are awarded for each county.

Last year 140 I. U. freshmen were winners of county scholarships. Seventy-six counties made the award. So far this year 52 counties are represented by scholarship winners, with 40 counties still to be heard from.

Tax levies are much discussed by the people today and possibly are much warranted, by what they believe to be exorbitant expenditures in salaries and hired help, and it will be up to the citizens to register their objections at the hearings of the taxing units set out in their proposals. The officials ought to be sure that they are not asking unjustly of the people this year.

Citizens of St. Joe, who number 407, according to the last census, have found some relief from the burdens of the day, with the announcement by the town board, that the tax rate will be 13 cents lower next year. Due to the financial condition of the town at this time, the village fathers agreed to cut their total rate from 63 cents to 50 cents in their proposal, as now being published in this paper. The date of final passage will be September 7th.

Practically all commercial and custom canneries are experiencing a great slump in their business. The bean crop in most canneries would have been completed by now under ordinary conditions but it has hardly started, due of course to the drought of the summer. Other vegetables have been slow to mature.

No that wasn't the street cleaning force of the town working on the pavement Monday evening. It was Frank Bowman and E. R. Kinsey taking their exercises. A dastardly attempt to burn the Methodist Church at Ray was frustrated by the timely discovery of preparations to that end. Several days before, a smell of something scorching had been noticed in the church, but all efforts to locate it failed. Entering the church in the evening the pastor, Rev. L. E. Clayton, saw a light under the pulpit. Investigating, he found an electric light bulb, around which had been tied a hymn book. The heat had scorched the leaves of this, causing the peculiar smell that had been noticed. An investigation is being made to ascertain the guilty party by the insurance company and state fire marshal.

A bee specialist has advised that when a bee stings it leaves the sting in the skin and being equipped with muscles it tends to go deeper. Don't make the mistake, the expert says, of trying to pull out the sting. It should be immediately scraped or scratched out with the fingernail, otherwise the poison sack empties into the flesh. When the bee prods its victim it tears itself from its sting, a sacrifice which costs the insect its life.

THE STORY

With his English wife, Catherine, and son, Jeems, Henry Bulain, French settler in Canada in 1749, cultivates a farm adjacent to the Tontour seigneurie. As the story opens the Bulains are returning from a visit to the Tontours. Catherine's wandering brother, Hepsibah, meets them with presents for the family. To Jeems he gives a pistol, bidding him perfect himself in marksmanship. Hepsibah fears for the safety of the Bulains in their isolated position. Jeems fights with Paul Tache, cousin of Tontour, whom they both adore. Next day Jeems calls at the Tontour home and apologizes for brawling in front of Toinette.

CHAPTER IV—Continued

Jeems did not go again to Tontour manor, though occasionally he heard news from the seigneurie. Every one was in high humor there because of the activities going on in preparation for the exit of the entire family for Quebec early in September. Toinette was going to school at the convent of the Ursulines. Jeems had a feeling of loss. It was as if the fire of his dreams had not only burned itself out, but even the ash were being cleared away.

Autumn came, and with it a great glory in the wilderness. Jeems loved these maturer days of golden ripeness, of first frosts, of painted hardwood forests, and of crisp, tangy air when all life seemed rejuvenated and his own veins danced to the thrill of unending promises and expectations. But this year a heaviness of heart was in him with the changing of the seasons. Toinette and her people left for Quebec, and one evening, a week later, Hepsibah gravely announced that he could no longer delay his departure for the far frontiers of Pennsylvania and the Ohio, where his obligations as a trader called him. Catherine was silent for a while, then cried softly to herself. Jeems drew back where his uncle would not see him clearly. Hepsibah cheerfulness did not like a lighted candle extinguished by a breath of wind. Hepsibah's face was grimly set, so hard was he fighting to hold a grip on his emotion. He promised that he would never again remain away long at a time. He would return during the winter. If he failed to come, they would know he was dead.

When Henri got out of his bed to build the fire the next morning Hepsibah was gone. He had stolen off like a shadow in some still hour of the night.

More determined than when his uncle had been with him, Jeems continued at his work and at the mental efforts with which he was struggling to reach out into the mountains and valleys of experience ahead of him. Through the fall and winter the Bulain cabin was visited by wandering Indians who had learned that food, warmth, and a welcome were always there. Jeems' friendship for them was tempered by the things Hepsibah had told him, and while he brought himself closer into intimacy with these uninvited guests, winning their confidence and making himself more efficient in their speech, he was also watching and listening for the signs of hidden dangers against which his uncle had repeatedly warned him. Most of the Indians were from the Canada tribes, and among them he found no cause for unrest, but when occasionally an Onondaga or an Oneida came, he detected in their manner a quiet and sleepless caution which told him these visitors from the Six Nations considered themselves over the dead line which marked the country of their enemies. And he made note that they always came through that part of Forbidden valley which Hepsibah had predicted would be a future warpath for the Mohawks.

This winter he went farther in his adventures. Captain Pipe, the old Ojibwa, had a habit of spending several of the hardest weeks near the Bulain, and with his two sons, White Eyes and Big Cat, Jeems traveled to the shores of Lake Champlain for the first time. He was gone a week and planned his friends to make a longest expedition the following year, as far as Crown Point and a place called Ticonderoga, where the French were going to build a fort some day. On this excursion he experienced the real thrill of danger, for White Eyes and Big Cat, both of whom were young braves who had won their spurs, moved with a caution which was eloquent in its significance.

With Toinette and her people away from the seigneurie, Jeems had no hesitation in going to the Richelieu, and made trips there with his father on snowshoes; and in March, during a break in a spell of intense cold, he went alone and remained overnight in the house of the baron's overseer with whose young people he had become acquainted. This overseer was Peter Lubek, an old veteran for whom Tontour held a warm affection, and through his son, Peter, the youngest, Jeems had his first news of Toinette. She was at the Ursuline school, and her parents had taken a fashionable house in St. Louis street. Peter said Tontour wrote in every letter to his father that he was homesick to get back to the Richelieu.

As another spring and summer followed those which had gone before, Jeems knew he was fighting something that had to be conquered, a yearning for Toinette which filled him with a bitter loneliness when its hold was strongest.

For two years Toinette remained in Quebec without making a visit to the Richelieu. During these years, the tragedy of his divided birth was forced upon Jeems. There was no doubt that the English in him was uppermost or that the urge in his blood was toward the southern frontiers and the colonies of Hepsibah Adams. Yet he sincere passion—the Big forest, Forbidden valley, all the miles of wilderness about him as far as he could look to the horizon. This was New France. It was his father's country and not his mother's. Between his father and himself a comradeship had grown up which nothing could break, but his worship for his mother was a different thing, as if something besides motherhood bound him to her. His friends had increased in number. He came to know people along the Richelieu but was always conscious he was not entirely one of them. Toinette's words and her hatred for him persisted in his memory and kept recalling this truth.

Late in August of the second year of her absence, Toinette returned to Tontour manor for a month. Jeems' heart ached with the old yearning, but he did not go to the seigneurie. Paul Tache and his mother were also at the baron's and he felt a sense of relief when he learned that all of them were on their way to Quebec, with the exception of Tontour, who remained for the harvesting of crops. A fortnight after they had gone, Peter told him about Toinette and Paul Tache. He had scarcely recognized Toinette, he said. She had grown taller and more beautiful. Tache was a full-grown man and dressed like a young noble. One with half an eye could see that he was desperately in love with Toinette, Peter avowed. But if he were a judge of such affairs, and he considered himself to be that, Tache was a long way from a realization of his desires, even taking Toinette's tender years into consideration. She granted him no favors. There had actually seemed to be a coolness in her attitude toward him.

Peter's words stirred Jeems with a satisfaction which he did not let the other see, and not until he was on his way home did he pull himself from the folly of his thoughts about Toinette. Even if she were not smiling on Tache as warmly as he had supposed, he knew she was as far removed from him now as the sun was from the earth. Yet, as time went on, this fresh contact with her presence, though he had not seen her, gave a determined impetus to his plans for the future. There were hours in which he saw himself a splendid enemy where fate had ordained that he could not be a friend. With increasing maturity giving to him a deeper and more understanding passion for his mother, and a fuller comprehension of the noble qualities in his father, he was harassed by a conflict of emotions which he revealed to neither, and confided only in Hepsibah Adams, who had returned from his trip. The difficulty of solving the problem which confronted Jeems was as great for Catherine's brother as it would have been for Catherine herself, for as early as the spring of 1753, when Jeems had passed his sixteenth year, there was no longer a doubt in the minds of the people of the Colonies and New France as to the surety of the struggle which was impending. While France and England were officially at peace, the forces of the two countries in America were on the verge of open war and were instigating the Indians to a strife of extermination. Everywhere along the unprotected frontiers the Indians were killing and burning and such vast sums were being expended by both sides for human hair that scores of white men had taken up the lucrative business of hunting for scalps.

Almost at the door to Jeems' home, war preparations were in progress, for every landed baron along the Richelieu was training his vassal farmers, and when the wind was right the Bulains could hear faintly the twice-a-week firing of muskets at Tontour manor. Being free of the seigneurial protection and laws, Henri did not go to drill. Nor did Jeems. Yet Tontour rode frequently to their home, especially when Hepsibah was there. He was in better spirits than usual, and it was all on account of Toinette, he said. She was homesick for the Richelieu. Her letters to him were filled with a longing for it, and she declared that, in another twelve months, when her schooling would be finished, she wanted to live at the manor and not in Quebec. That was enough to make him happy, and he laughed at the thought of danger for womenfolk along the Richelieu—in the fortified places. The English and their savages would not get nearer than the lower end of Lake Champlain when war came; and they would be driven from there very shortly, and also from Lake George. But on such an outlying farm as the Bulain place, which had no protection whatever, there was the possible peril of wandering scalp hunters and the need of urging his mother and Catherine to make their home within the safety of the seigneurie.

He asked Jeems and Henri to come to his drill, and that they did not respond made no difference in his friendship. He could understand how hard it would be for Henri to prepare for war against his wife's country, and his secret admiration for Catherine's greater courage and her courage and her faith in both peoples with the catastrophe so near. It delighted him to think that his own confidence was a comfort to her, and the eagerness with which she accepted his opinion as a soldier encouraged him to go beyond what Hepsibah considered intelligent bounds in giving assent to her mind. He did not guess what was in Jeems' heart, nor did the boy's father or mother. Only Hepsibah knew fully what was there.

Early in the autumn, the trader took Jeems on a journey to the English fort on Lake George, thence traveling into the New York country, returning in November. They found a change in Catherine. She was not less confident or less contented in the paradise she was helping to build, but something had come into her life which she was accepting bravely and courageously and even with pride. One evening, she spoke of the military activities along the Richelieu. Many river youths were training with their elders, she said, and it did not seem right that Jeems should not be among them. While killing was wicked and incurable, it was a God-given privilege to defend one's home and family. She quoted Tontour to substantiate her belief that war would never reach them, and she knew that Jeems would not seek it any more than his father. But she thought it would do no harm for Jeems to prepare himself along with the other young men of the seigneurie.

To this suggestion Hepsibah's homely philosophy made objection. He told Catherine the day was coming when Jeems would be compelled to fight and that he would have to choose one side or the other to champion. When that day arrived, sentiment would not stand in the way, for, with a world in turmoil about them, one could not be English and French at the same time. No man could tell on which side they would be when forced to it, and as he despised a traitor more than anything else, it was his opinion that Jeems should not be taught the ways of war under the flag of France and then, it might be, fight for the English. As a frontiersman, he maintained that the finest fighting man was the Long Rifle, a free wanderer of the forests, a leather-stocking, trained to a hundred greater things than the firing of a musket in company with a score of others. That was what Jeems should be. As a Long Rifle he could serve where honor and duty called him when the act became necessary.

Simple Strategy That Ended Frog's 'Talkfest'

Picturesque lily pools ornament the grounds of a famous hotel in Pasadena, Calif. In the lily pools are numerous large, deep-throated bullfrogs, picturesque enough by day but a terror during darkness at night with their loud croaking. Ducks were introduced, but the row they made when they caught a frog too big to eat but too nice to let go proved worse than the hubbub they were supposed to cure. Quackless Muscovy ducks were substituted. These appeared to annoy the frogs considerably, but they ate more flowers and plants than frogs. A bounty of 5 cents a frog was then offered to neighboring children, and more frogs than had ever been seen or heard in the country were speedily brought in as having been extracted from the pools in the hotel grounds. A sharpshooter was the next expert, but he woke up more people than the frogs. Then the hotel manager read "Frog" in all its aspects, and solved the problem. He strung an electric light over each pool (a good hurricane lamp serves equally well where electricity is not available), and, behold! the baffled brutes henceforth sat silently waiting for the darkness that never came.

Wide Brims Are in Versatile Mood

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

YES, indeed, "variety is the spice of life," and one way of proving it is to go sight-seeing where summer hat fashions are on display.

What with every type of headpiece being included from the beret not much larger than a teacup to brims that hug the head to the need of a sunshade or parasol, well may Dame Fashion bid every woman to "be yourself" when it comes to the hat or hats of her choice.

Recently, however, there has been a very definite turn in the tide of millinery affairs in that for summer, wide brims have come in with a flourish, not that there is a sameness about them (the ubiquitous panama the exception) for the large hat as interpreted at the present moment is a creation of imagination and caprice.

Some little idea of the versatility of big-of-brim hat which go to make up the midsummer collections may be gained from the quartette of smart Paris models shown in the illustration. The hat at the top is of rough blue straw. It is trimmed with wide plaid taffeta ribbon.

Below, to the left, the hat pictured is one of the summery transparent effects which are so outstanding in millinery modes of the immediate moment.

It is white, beribboned in velvet in a lovely mosaic blue.

The hat with its saucy retousse tilt at the front is an exceedingly fine hand-sewn black milan straw, for fashionable straws are just like that this season—go to the extremes of being either very rough and loose-woven or very, very fine and smooth. In every instance they are delightfully lightweight. Wide, black satin ribbon trims this hat.

Note the lace mesh effect which features the newest crowns for the midsummer hat as shown in the concluding number of this group. The enormous brim is very fine black milan. White roses pose at the side. This touch of white is significant for the chic Parisienne seldom fails to add the "necessary" touch of white to her costume.

CURLICUE COIFFURE AGAIN IS POPULAR

The stiffly waved, curlicue coiffure of the late thirties, with 100 additions, is much in evidence in Paris today. Women are wearing their hair in curls that cling closely to the lines of the head, framing an open brow and just revealing the tips of the ears, the whole thing being finished in rolls or curls at the nape of the neck.

A thousand new style devices have been launched, as aids to simplifying an otherwise fairly complicated headgear. Elaborate new hairpins and combs, intended to be invisible, and sleeping and morning caps, meant to hold the hair in place in off-hours, are crowding the Paris shops.

The most striking of all the new fashions are the new diamond hair-clips, outrageous in the small jeweled clips that women are now wearing on their frocks, in place of brooches. The new clips are long and narrow and are equipped with little slides that hold waves in place at the sides of the head.

The current fashion is to wear these slides in sets of four, two at either side of the temples.

Modes of This Summer Kind to Larger Women

Fashion this summer is very kind to the woman who takes a size 40. She can wear the smartest fashions of the season, adapted to her particular proportions.

The jacket mode is a welcome one. Larger women hesitate to wear sleeveless dresses in public places. The jacket costume enables them to wear short sleeves or no sleeves at home, and still have the more becoming long or three-quarter sleeves when they go out.

For large women the jacket looks best when it matches the skirt or contrasts in a way that is not striking. They will not be tempted by white fabrics with dark skirts, although if they are not too large in the hips to stand the cut-off effect they can wear dark jackets with light frocks.

Boucle is flattering because it fits splendidly without either being bulky or clinging too much. Shantung is a summer sporty fabric which also tailors wonderfully for the larger figure. Hats for the woman who requires a large head size, if properly proportioned, may be an excellent complement to the summer costume. Panamas, rough straws and bakus are made with the simplest of lines, but styled correctly to play their part in the summer wardrobe.

Smart Evening Wear

Midsummer fashion displays leave no doubt in the mind as to the style prestige accorded cotton fabrics of every type. Paris designers are especially enthusiastic in regard to the very new and attractive cotton mesh weaves. The charming evening gown pictured, which is made of white cotton mesh, bears testimony to the grace and admirable draping qualities of this material. The sophisticated simplicity of this gown is a feature of the present evening mode.

Cowl Neckline Is Still Very Much in the Mode

Despite several seasons of popularity, the cowl neckline persists, and now that it has become so generally established in favor it is likely to remain so at least as long as any of your summer dresses. It is becoming to almost every one and may be arranged in a fairly deep V if you like, or in a wider, more oval outline. It is sometimes arranged with a "modesty piece" of lace or lingerie.

Lesson for August 16

SOWING AND REAPING (Temperance Lesson.)

LESSON TEXT—Galatians 6:1-10.
GOLDEN TEXT—He that sows to himself shall also reap.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Obedience to the Law.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Obedience to the Law.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Sowing and Reaping (Effects of Alcohol).
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Sowing and Reaping (Effects of Alcohol).

In chapters three and four Paul presented in a masterly way the heart of Christianity; namely, that justification is by faith in the atoning work of Christ rather than by the works of the law. In chapters five and six he made practical application of the doctrine to the affairs of life. Gracious justification by faith is the dynamic for right living. Those who are freely justified in Christ will manifest the fact by the following conduct:

I. Restore the Sinning Brother (v. 1).

1. Who he is. "The one overtaken in a fault." The idea expressed by the word "fault" is not to minimize the sin, but to show the suddenness of the temptation. One's spirituality is shown by his willingness to help in such a case.

2. What is to be done. He is to be "restored." Restore is a surgical term which means the placing back of a diseased member to its normal place. Christians are members of the body of Christ. Therefore, the sinning of a brother should as really give us pain as the dislocation of a member of our body.

3. How it is to be done. "In a spirit of meekness." Harshness has no place in the life of a Christian. The fruit of the Spirit is love, meekness, etc. The believer must show his right to claim the life in the heavens by stooping down to help the brother crippled and beset in the dirt of earth.

4. The incentive. "Lest thou also be tempted." No one is immune from temptation. The surest way to be fortified against temptation is to go sympathetically to the rescue of the fallen.

II. Bear One Another's Burdens (v. 2).

Many are the burdens of life: burdens of weakness, temptations of a fallen nature, sorrow, suffering, and sin. Some have more temptations than others. Since believers are inseparably bound together, the strong should bear the infirmities of the weak. Christ is the supreme burden bearer. When we bear one another's burdens, we fulfill the law of Christ. Many have inherited the appetite for intoxicating liquors, and the spirit of burden bearing will move us to make our utmost endeavor to remove far away the temptation to strong drink.

III. Bear Our Own Burdens (v. 3-5). There are some burdens which can be borne alone by the individual. Personal responsibility cannot be escaped. In a most real sense every man lives his life alone. Helpful as is sympathy, human and divine, greatly as we need the helping hand of our brother, the individual must live his own life. The law of God which is in harmony with the law which controls the individual declares, "The soul that sinneth it shall die."

IV. Support Teachers of God's Word (v. 6-8).

It is incumbent upon those who are taught in God's Word to give of their means for the support of the teacher. To requite this obligation is to mock God (v. 7), for God has ordained that they who preach the gospel shall live of the gospel (I Cor. 9:14). The declaration, "Whoever a man soweth that shall he also reap," sets forth a law which operates in all spheres of life.

V. Be Earnest in Well Doing (v. 9).

The harvest is sure. Sow good seed and patiently wait for the reward. The same unfailing law which eventuates in a harvest of corruption to those who sow to the flesh will bring life everlasting to those who sow to the Spirit.

VI. Work for the Good of All Men (v. 10).

The believer in Christ who realizes his freedom will have sympathies and interests as wide as the race. While especially endeavoring to help those in Christ, he will be reaching out to all men. He will be seeking to win them to Christ. This obligation to work for the good of all men applies in such matters as the abolition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages.

The Righteous

The righteous are as trees of life; the fruits of their piety and charity, their instructions, reproaches, examples and prayers, their interest in heaven and their influence on earth are like the fruits of that tree, precious and useful, contributing to the support and nourishment of the spiritual life in many.—Matthew Henry.

HOUSE THE PULLETS EARLY

(By Prof. Paul G. Riley)

Commercial poultrymen all over the United States have found that good egg production from pullets is not possible as long as the birds are given range. It is not only advisable but is necessary that the pullets be housed about the time they are starting to lay. Most people who are not primarily dependent on poultry for making their living haven't as yet learned this lesson, and a great many times we hear the statement made, "I never have been able to get my pullets to lay before Christmas." It is often difficult to get these people to admit that anyone gets egg production from pullets in the full months, regardless of time of hatch.

Pullets are like children as long as they have all outdoors in which to run around, they really enjoy themselves. But we are keeping chickens for profit, not pleasure. The reason we can't get egg production from pullets as long as they are on the range, or are permitted to have free range, is that they don't eat that slightly additional amount of feed that it takes to produce eggs in profitable numbers.

Leghorns should be housed at four and a half to five months of age, depending on maturity. Heavy breed pullets should be housed at five and a half to six months of age. All pullets, regardless of age, should be housed by October 15, and certainly not later than November 1.

It is necessary to get the feed and the chickens together and to keep them together, because they will immediately eat two to three pounds more feed per hundred pullets per day in confinement than when on the range, and it is this additional two to three pounds of feed that increases the egg production.

A good procedure is to house the pullets and keep them confined to the house for a month. Then if the weather is nice, they can be turned out about four o'clock in the afternoon, gradually increasing the time when they are allowed out until they are being turned out at noon. Laying hens should be confined the year around until noon for most profitable egg production.

BUS COMPETITION HITS RAILROADS

Bankers Association President Asks If Unfair Aid Is Given Motorized Transport—For Rail Mergers.

NEW YORK.—Fair treatment for the railroads in respect to highway motor competition was called for by Rome C. Stephenson, President American Bankers Association, in a recent address here. He also strongly endorsed "sound economic railway consolidation" and praised President Hoover for his initiative in this respect.

"I am very strongly of the opinion that one of the measures which would help materially to put back business where it ought to be in the Eastern four-system plan of railroad consolidation as announced recently following negotiations instituted by President Hoover," said Mr. Stephenson.

"Its adoption by the Interstate Commerce Commission would tend to stabilize the transportation industry, facilitate operation and exert a favorable influence on business in general."

"It is a fact well known to business leaders that our railroads are now facing a crisis. Not only do they need protective laws to meet competitive situations arising from increased use of our highways and waterways by other carriers, but they need unification such as the proposed four-system plan provides. Our President has acted wisely in assuming a leadership in this respect and his move deserves the support of every clear-thinking citizen."

Mr. Stephenson declared that the railroads have served this country "so superlatively well that we are prone in our public affairs to overlook our dependence upon them and our obligations to them. The present and future progress of the United States is inseparably bound up with their welfare. In neglecting just consideration for them we are even more neglectful of the public's best economic interests."

A Question of Public Interest

"We are confronted with the question as to how much more the public economic interest will stand an invasion of the welfare of the railroads by forces and difficulties not of their own creating and not within the scope of their own unaided powers to combat," said Mr. Stephenson. "I refer especially to new competitors that are undermining the hard-earned position of the railroads, not only with the aid of natural economic forces but also through the aid of government policies which, positively or negatively, tend to give these competitors undue advantages over the railroads."

"It goes without saying that the railroads have no right, nor claim any, so far as I have been able to discern, to complain at legitimate competition in the field of transportation, for the public is entitled to the best possible transportation at the lowest practical cost. But equally does it go without saying that the government has no right to do things that it could not otherwise do as unaided private enterprises, particularly when such action impairs the invested rights held in good faith by great masses of our people in established enterprises that are serving the public well."

Mr. Stephenson said it was not his purpose to argue against such competitive transportation as the highway passenger motorbus and motor truck as such, when conducted under proper conditions and in keeping with public welfare and benefit. He declared, however, there is need for serious consideration whether such competition is being developed under conditions that are unfair to the railroads, because either the outright or obscure aid of government policy is the deciding economic factor in that competition.

Would Investigate Bus Traffic

Railroad rights of way, he declared, represent tremendous capital investments, on which the railroads have also heavy current costs to meet. "They pay every day a million dollars in taxes and most of this is on their rights of way," he said. "Also they spend daily over two million dollars additional for the proper maintenance of way." He asserted that the motorbuses have not had to pay for their rights of way in any sense that the railroads paid for theirs.

"They have simply taken possession of public highways built by public funds, both state and national," he continued, "and they have extensively made those highways vastly less comfortable, less safe and less serviceable for private motorists and others who are contributing chiefly to their creation and maintenance."

Mr. Stephenson declared that all these matters should be thoroughly inquired into by competent public bodies, both state and national, with a view to determining the equities and the case or whether it would call for such drastic action as the exclusion of this traffic from our public general highways, and the requirement that, even as the railroads, it provide as a part of its own private capital investment in its own rights of way and for its own maintenance of way out of operating income."

"I venture to say," he added, "that such inquiries would show whether it is to the public interest to let things remain as they are, or whether the situation calls for a new basis of motorbus and truck taxes to satisfy the equities of the case or whether it would call for such drastic action as the exclusion of this traffic from our public general highways, and the requirement that, even as the railroads, it provide as a part of its own private capital investment in its own rights of way and for its own maintenance of way out of operating income."

When people start giving you something for nothing, that is a good time not to buy.

One of the best recommendations for a private citizen is for him to be able to deliver whatever he says.

The ways of humanity: A man violates the law and goes to jail. Returns home and blames every friend he ever had for getting him into trouble. A man gets elected to office. Returns home and can't see a single friend that elected him to office. A man sings a hard luck story and gets credit at the local grocery. Returns home and curses the grocer black and pink for sending him a statement. A man begs on his knees for her hand. Goes home and says, why in did I ever marry that woman any way. An-so forthly speaking.

PAY ADMISSION TO FAIR WITH WHEAT

One bushel of wheat will be accepted for admission to the Indiana State Fair on Wednesday, September 9, Farmers Day, according to a recent decision of the executive committee of the Indiana Board of Agriculture. This decision will permit farmers to receive a value equal to fifty cents for a part of their wheat. The plan is that one bushel will be accepted as payment for one adult admission, one bushel will admit an automobile and one-half bushel will admit a child under twelve years of age.

The Indiana Board of Agriculture, realizing that Indiana Farmers have more wheat than they know what to do with at present prices and knowing that money is scarce, are accepting the wheat at a loss, in the belief that the State Fair is of such value to the visitors, especially from rural communities, that the loss is warranted. It is the first instance of a State Fair Board reverting to barter for admission, and the result is expected to be wide spread.

Wednesday, September 9, Farmers Day at the Fair, there will be trucks at the Northeast gate of the State Fairgrounds, on 42nd Street near Fall Creek Boulevard, in which the wheat will be dumped and hauled away. The farmers will be allowed to retain the bags or baskets in which they bring the wheat. Wheat will be accepted for admission only at the Northeast gate on Wednesday, September 9.

HOW TO LIGHTEN
THE TAX BURDEN

Quit spending money is the best way as everyone knows, to lighten the tax burden. When John Moorman or any one proposes a hundred per cent increase in the automobile license fees and a two cent increase in gasoline tax as the way out of our tax relief they merely propose a tremendous increase in taxes on those who already are paying more taxes by a great deal than any one else. It is not only time to get relief in other forms of taxation, but this thing of everlastingly adding more tax on to the automobile has gone far enough. It is time to call a halt.

If the public is in earnest about demanding tax relief then quit building roads under the three mile road law or the county unit road law—take a vacation in county and township road building and that is where a big part of our tax trouble comes from. But as to automobile taxes being increased, I for one say no, and as president of the Hoosier State Automobile Association I shall recommend to our organization, which has always championed the interests of the automobile owners of this state, that we favor a reduction in automobile license fees to a uniform fee of three dollars per car and let the present gas tax of four cents be the measure of the use of the road. Buses and trucks as common carriers of course, must be dealt with as such and charged accordingly.

Continuing his statement on this subject Mr. Props points out "the national survey of the American Automobile Association shows that the taxes in 1930 paid on automobiles amounted to seventeen per cent of the value of all the automobiles in the United States. In Indiana the gas tax, auto license fees, and personal property tax amount to more than an average of thirty-five dollars per car and the average value of all cars in the state will fall much below three hundred and fifty dollars a car, but allowing three hundred and fifty dollars per car as a fair estimate that makes 10% of the value of his car each year each motorist is paying in taxes. I am not aware of any other class of property that pays half as much. In addition there is the cost of certificate of title and driver's license cost and notary fees, each year. Thousands of people depend upon their car to get to their work or as a necessary adjunct to the actual earning of their living and in these days of depression thousands have lost their cars to the finance companies, or have lost them for other reasons.

Furthermore said the State Motor Club president, "the gas tax and license money distribution should be left just as it is. The state highway department now receives the license money and three cents of the gas tax. What do they do with that money? They take over more roads all the time in the counties for maintenance and construction. Those roads that are taken over are the most expensive ones for the counties to maintain and when taken over constitute a direct tax relief to the county—just as definite as any relief could be. Also in so doing the motorist gets good roads for the SPECIAL taxes he is paying for that purpose. No one questions but what more is secured for the money when expended this way than if spent by the counties and townships. Another thing—these highways have brought our counties closer together than townships used to be. That should make economies in local government possible and practical. Then still as other advantages, we have the commercial and social advantages that come from developing our state highways and these advantages mean a lot in helping to make life more worth while."

YEARLY MEETING WAS WELL ATTENDED

The annual meeting of the Churches of Christ of DeKalb County was held in the Concord Township Gymnasium in St. Joe last Sunday, the Coburn's Corners Church having charge of the arrangements and the day's program.

Sunday School was conducted at 9:30, Fred Hart, superintendent having charge. Walter Coburn of Crescent, Oklahoma, led the Sunday School singing, assisted by the Coburntown orchestra. The classes were then assigned to their places with the following teachers: Juniors, Carl Hart; young people, Mrs. Gee; young married people, Ida Andrews; older married people, Clyde Hart; bible class, J. O. Rose; beginners, Beatrice Woodcox; primary, Bernice Wilder.

The secretary's report showed an attendance of 174 with a collection of $9.70. Fred Thomas of Newville led the singing for the church service following Sunday School. Scripture lesson was read by J. O. Rose, Fred Thomas offering prayer. J. O. Rose then introduced the speaker of the day, Dean Walker head of the Chair of Church History at Butler college, Indianapolis, who spoke on the subject, "The Stream of the Faithful." Mr. Walker proved to be an able speaker and in a clear and simple manner he portrayed the stream of the faithful from the time of Christ to the present day, as the people who are true to the teachings of Christ and His work.

At the noon hour basket dinner was served in the domestic science room in the school house. The afternoon session opened at 2:00 o'clock with a song service led by Mr. Thomas. Scripture lesson was read by Rev. Keller of Auburn, prayer being offered by

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

Why Is It "Hoodlum" and "Hooligan"?

We all know a "hoodlum" to be a ruffian. The word is frequently applied to street urchins who make a nuisance of themselves generally, but it is in the sense of roughneck that it is usually understood.

We have it after a gangster named Muldoon, who, in 1898, made life miserable for many of the citizens of San Francisco.

Public indignation finally led to Muldoon's arrest and arraignment under the name of "Noodlum," which, because of the bad handwriting of the court clerk, was misread as "Hoodlum," in which form it stayed in our language in the general sense.

In this connection, it might be stated that our word "Hooligan" for a roustabout is similarly derived from the name of a notorious gangster of London in the year 1898.

LIGHTS OF NEW YORK—By WALTER TRUMBULL

Practically anyone can go to bed, but not everyone can go to sleep. For this there are various remedies. All depends upon the form of wakefulness from which a person suffers. I know a man who is kept awake by any light. He happened to get a room in a hotel where a street light shone through his window. Knowing that his wife sometimes slept with a stocking over her eyes, he tried the scheme with a sock. Apparently, he didn't know the trick of adjusting it, as it constantly slipped down over his nose and mouth, threatening to smother him. Finally, he removed the bed so that he lay with his head away from the window. This was a pretty good idea, except for the fact that he had a stiff neck in the morning from twisting about to see whether the light was still there.

Another man I know can't stand noises; at least, city noises are a source of irritation to him. When he lies down to sleep he finds himself counting trucks and automobiles which roll by. Somebody told him about some wax things which you put in your ears and he thought the problem was solved. The next time he came in from the country he prepared for a peaceful night in town by getting some of the wax plugs and inserting them. The rest of the night he lay awake, straining his ears to discover whether he could hear through the wax.

There is a friend of mine who lives next to an armory. In the regiment to which the armory belonged was a man who evidently had ambitions to become a bugler. After everything was over on drill nights and the others had gone home, he would remain and practice bugle calls. Perhaps at eleven o'clock, he would blow tattoo for a while, which was fair enough, but around midnight he would start in on reveille, or boots and saddles. Later still, he might blow the mess call. Now the listener to whom I refer is a man who retires and rises early, but he had no desire to boot and saddle at 1 a. m. And as for the mess call, his doctor refuses to permit him to eat at night. The result is that a good, hard-working fellow with music in his soul may never become an expert bugler, merely through lack of practice.

Some persons are like that. They have no appreciation of honest effort. A side street in New York was being excavated, as all streets are. Some time in the early hours a workman with a lantern climbed down into the trench and began to beat cheerily with a hammer on a piece of metal. Henry W. Longfellow would have appreciated such industry. He might have been inspired to write something also along the line of "The Village Blacksmith." But the fellow who did hear the musical notes was no poet, but only a retired for the night business man. Securing three electric light bulbs, he hurried them in quick succession from a seventh-story window, so that they struck what was left of the street in the immediate vicinity of the worker. If you ever have dropped an electric light bulb on a hard surface from any height, you know what happened. The cheerful worker got out of that excavation in one jump and made the first 100 yards in record time. To his dying day, he probably will believe that some one was shooting at him.

Golfer's and bridge player's insomnia are among the commonest forms of the malady. The golfer plays each shot over; the bridge player each hand. Between dark and daylight, some most remarkable drives are made and every finesse is successful. About the only cure I know for this form of wakefulness is chloroform.

But there is the old reliable method of inducing slumber. First you must relax all your muscles and your jaw.

The Fishing Game

As many as wish to can play this game. All you need are sharp eyes, quickness and a place to be comfortable. As well as a small basket, some pieces of paper, pencils and a love of fun. There, have you everything?

The words that are given herewith are to be copied on tiny squares of paper, all mixed up together and put into the box or basket. Now choose partners! And one captain! Don't look! Just put your hands (in turn, of course) into the basket and draw one piece of paper with a word written on it, then another, until all are drawn.

The captain says, READY, SET,

GO! And every child playing the game makes a list of all the words he sees in the words he fished from the basket.

The captain says, STOP! And the partners whose lists are the longest win the game.

Here are some suggested words. Of course, you can use other. Remember, the words you see may not be properly arranged in the words you draw. You may have to hunt for them.

adventure	handkerchief airplane	healthiest
mountain	musician
elephant	penmanship

Then you must close your eyes and vision a great, green meadow, divided by a hedge. Now it is necessary to fill the meadow with sheep and start them jumping over the hedge. As they go over, you count them, one by one. After you have counted a million, it may be well, for the sake of variety, to switch to goats.

Oldest Office Holder

on Job for 60 Years

Richmond, Va.—Sergeant Patrick Boleson of the Richmond police force claims to be Virginia's oldest officeholder. He is eighty-one and is entering his sixty-first consecutive year of public service in Richmond. He was sheriff at Danville during the race riot there in the early '90s. Once, almost single-handed, he turned back a mob seeking to attack the jail to secure a negro prisoner.

Forgets Rented Horse; Tied to Tree 3 Days

Pittsburgh.—When Frank Sopolski hired a saddle horse and had not returned it two days later George Fassinder, owner of the South Hills riding school, figured something was wrong. A 12-hour search located Sopolski at his home.

Then, Fassinder told Humane society officials, Sopolski thought of the horse for the first time since he had gone swimming in a South park pool. He wasn't quite certain where he had left the horse, Fassinder said, but they finally found it in a clump of woods a quarter of a mile from the pool. The horse, its owner said, had been tied to a tree so closely that it had not been able to reach food nor water during the 76 hours it was there.

At a hearing before Ald. Patrick Cawley, Sopolski was fined $10 for cruelty to animals and posted $1,000 bond for a hearing on the criminal charge of failing to return a rented horse.

IS TOO MUCH?

American women know the answer. They are smart shoppers, keen judges of value. That's why, instead of paying high prices for French names and fancy packages, they used more than three million boxes of Plough's "Favorite Bouquet" Face Powder last year. ### Man's Natural Desire to Duplicate Success

Novelist Thornton Wilder was talking about a book that had been a best seller.

"The writer of that book," he said, "will expect all his books to be best sellers now. Of course, they won't be; it's impossible; but success—well, success does have a queer effect on you."

"There's a story about a poorish sort of golfer who joined a golf club, and on his first round he hit the ball a whack that by a miracle landed it in the hole in one."

"A second miracle happened at the next hole. The golfer once more whacked the ball, it flew through the air, landed, rolled slowly across the green and disappeared in the hole again. Another hole in one!"

"The golfer watched it disappear. Then he turned. He was pale and trembling."

"Golly," he said, "I thought I'd missed it that time."

Salt Statistics

The man who "isn't worth his weight in salt" and the one who "feels like 30 cents" seem to be on a par, judging from the salt statistics of last year. During that period, 8,000,000 tons of salt were produced and the total value was about $25,000,000, which on the basis of a 200-pound man works out at about the rate of 30 cents.

Michigan led in production, and with New York, Kansas and Louisiana accounted for 98 per cent of the national production.

It is generally believed that the shark is the most dangerous fish, but the barracuda, a large, savage, pike-like fish of the tropical seas, is more apt to attack man than the shark. ### DESSERTS AND THINGS

A dessert does not need to be either elaborate in its preparation or expensive in cost to be appetizing. Many of the simplest of desserts are the most popular.

Duchess Cream.—This delightful dessert serves fifteen, so it may be cut into half for the ordinary family. Cook six tablespoonfuls of tapioca in boiling water until clear, cool, add a little salt, one cupful of sugar, the juice from a can of pineapple, the juice of two oranges and two lemons. Cook until thick. Cool, then add the pineapple, one cupful of finely broken nuts and a pint of whipping cream beaten stiff.

Two-Two Dessert.—Take the juice of two lemons, the finely minced pulp of two bananas and two cupfuls of sugar. Add a quart of this cream, a pinch of salt and freeze.

Sainty Dessert.—Cut with scissors dipped into cold water, one pound of marshmallows, add one cupful of cut pecan nuts, or almonds if preferred; add enough whipped cream to make a mixture to stand up well. Serve in sherbet glasses with a spoonful or two of orange and pineapple juice poured over each. Top with a maraschino cherry.

Cherry Ice Cream.—Use a cupful of rich cherry juice and one pint of cream with a few drops of almond extract. Sweeten to taste and freeze as usual. Serve in sherbet cups and garnish with a spoonful of minced cherries and a spot of whipped cream.

Spanish Pepper Salad.—Dissolve one package of lemon gelatin in one and one-fourth cupfuls of boiling water, add a teaspoonful of salt, the juice of a lemon and one-half cupful of mild vinegar. Mix with six canned pinelitos finely chopped, one cupful each of pecans cut fine and celery, also finely cut. Mold in individual molds and serve with highly seasoned mayonnaise, unmolded on nests of lettuce.

New Grandstand At Indiana State Fair Completed

The new steel and concrete grandstand at the Indiana State Fair Grounds has been completed and will be ready for use during the 1931 State Fair, September 5 to 12. This new structure was built entirely of Indiana materials by Indiana labor and is the best of its kind in the country.

Among the new features in grandstand construction are the seating arrangements. Every seat commands a clear view of the entire track with no obstruction. Each row of seats is high enough above the row in front of it so that even short people will be able to see the track in front without standing. The steel and concrete construction removes all danger of fire or collapse during occupation. This last feature is a great improvement over the grandstand which has been used at the State Fair grounds for many years.

The exits and entrances are designed so that there will be no crowding around the ticket gates and the entire stand may be emptied in a very few minutes. Provision is made for the Fire and Police Departments which are on hand during the State Fair. They have been given plenty of space for their operations in one corner of the building.

Two floors of space are also provided, which will be used for exhibits and concessions. Many of these will be placed in the new grandstand rather than on the grounds this year. Rest room facilities have been greatly improved giving ready access to both those seated in the grandstand and to those on the grounds.

The completion of the new grandstand makes the Indiana State Fair Grounds second to none in the country as to equipment and completeness. The Indiana Board of Agriculture is proud of the new structure and feels sure that it will be well used for many years.

Complete Carnival On Midway At The Indiana State Fair

Murphy Shows travel in their own train of thirty double length railroad cars and more than 500 persons are on the payroll. Among the special features that will be found on the midway during the State Fair, September 5 to 12, will be the "Melody Maids," featuring Miss Alice Melville and her Hollywood Troup of Dancers; the "Georgia Minstrels," a splendid company of thirty colored musicians; several large collections of real freaks and many others.

Amusement will be provided for young as well as old at the Indiana State Fair this year.

Better Baby Demonstrations, Indiana State Fair, Sept. 5th to 12th, 1931

By Ada E. Schweitzer, M. D.

Each year the Indiana State Fair better babies activities conducted by the child hygiene division of the state board of health demonstrate to the public recent approved standards and methods of baby care. From the first better baby contest and exhibit in 1920, to 1930 when the registration of the contest alone totaled 1,585, the Indiana State Board of Agriculture has increased the facilities for the work to keep pace with the rapidly growing interest of the public.

The cooperation of the Board of Agriculture and the Indianapolis News with the State Board of Health, Child Hygiene Division, has made possible this remarkable progress.

The Better Babies Building will be the center for examination of non-contest babies and will house a day nursery, diet kitchen, and many exhibits. To the north is the modern rest park, and on the south, the pre-school playground.

On each day of the 1931 Fair excepting Sunday, all former contest babies under school age will be eligible for reexamination at the Better Babies Building and may secure appointments by communicating with Dr. Ada E. Schweitzer, 5 State House Annex, Indianapolis. This is not a contest but a check over of the child's condition. Parents will receive from the child hygiene division needed pamphlets concerning health standards and care.

Every effort will be made to arrange for the comfort and convenience of mothers and babies, as well as to furnish an approved educational program. The state child hygiene staff will be assisted by physicians, psychologists, nurses, clerks and playground directors employed by the Board of Agriculture. The Indianapolis child hygiene department, Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts and Camp Fire Girls will assist.

All Would Benefit by Attending The Indiana State Fair, Says Dean Skinner of Purdue

Indiana citizens gain in education every year by visiting the Indiana State Fair, held this year September 5 to 12, according to Dean J. H. Skinner of Purdue University, ex-officio member of the Indiana Board of Agriculture. He says:

"The Indiana State Fair has proven to be one of the great educational institutions for the agricultural and industrial people in the Middle West. In fact, the Indiana State Fair is the great Midwest exposition in which all kinds of manufactured products, crops, livestock, poultry, farm products and even boys and girls are shown to the public in the most attractive way possible. No other State Fair in the country has better equipment, now that the new grandstand is completed, better premiums and attendance."

"The Indiana Board of Agriculture has for years been stressing educational features and exhibits in all departments in a large way. It has provided a school for girls and a club camp for boys. It provides an unequalled race program and wholesome, clean entertainment for the visitors. No matter what the weather, the Indiana Board of Agriculture is now equipped and prepared to carry on an excellent program with assurance that the public will be well cared for under any circumstances."

"Every Indiana man, woman and child, whether living on a farm or in the city will be benefited by attending the Indiana State Fair for one or more days."

National Guard to Give Aerial Demonstration at State Fair

The 118th Observation Squadron of the Indiana National Guard Air Force will give a demonstration of military formations and maneuvers Saturday afternoon, September 12 at the Indiana State Fair. This demonstration is being given to acquaint the people of Indiana with the new developments in military aviation and to show the advances made in aerobics design. The best pilots in the National Guard unit will have their planes in fighting trim and guarantee a thrill to all who attend the State Fair that day. The flying will be done in front of the new grandstand.

The Gus Sun Three Ring Circus has been booked to appear six days during the Indiana State Fair, September 8 to 13. Performances will be given Saturday evening, September 5, in the coliseum, and the nights of September 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 in front of the new grandstand on the State Fair Grounds. This circus, which usually appears in a "Big Top," will be in the open air except for the first performance and the spectators will be seated in the new $225,000 Grand Stand. Harness races on the mile track will precede the circus performance and it will be followed by a mammoth display of fireworks by the Hudson Fireworks Company. One ticket is good for admission to the entire evening program in front of the grandstand.

Great Airport Over London Is Suggested

Some bold persons have proposed that an immense airport be built in London over the Kings Cross station and vicinity, supported on pillars in the form of warehouses and office buildings. Here is a model of the airport that is being exhibited.

Beautiful Spy Dying in Madhouse

"Blond Lady of Antwerp" Prisoner in Asylum.

Berlin.—Formerly one of the cleverest and most beautiful spies the world has ever seen, a haggard, wild-eyed woman, whose name is given as Bertha Helrich, lies in the great asylum for the insane at Wittenau, near here, awaiting her rapidly approaching end.

An entry in the books of the institution indicates that she was a hopeless drug addict, when, more than two years ago, she was first admitted. But behind that simple entry lies the story of one of the most amazing personalities of the war years.

Known as the "Blond Lady of Antwerp," she was one of Germany's most successful spies, and betrayed countless allied secret service men.

Caused Many Deaths. Her victims, however, were by no means confined to that field, for one of her duties was the appointment of hundreds of German agents, and these, without being in the least aware of the fact, were in turn spied on by members of a special corps which she had organized.

It has been averred that in this way she was responsible for the shooting of a number of spies in the pay of Germany who were suspected of playing their paymasters false.

At the height of her power she was a tall, slim, graceful creature, possessing an irresistible allure. In a pale oval face of delicate mold were set two big blue eyes, luminous and appealing. Few there were who could say "No" to her, and yet, behind all fascination there worked a brain masterly in its perception and intuition.

Little more than a girl when she first entered Germany's spy service, she soon revealed such brilliant qualities that it was not long before she was left with a free hand. She made Antwerp her headquarters, and it was there that she brought off some of her greatest coups.

Used "It" on Captives. When a Belgian or French secret service agent was taken by the German, he was, in nine cases out of ten, left to the mercies of the "Blond Lady." Her "interrogation" followed none of the orthodox lines; all the witchery and fascination nature had given her were employed to the full. And in almost every instance where the stern cross-examination of a military court would have been resisted, the skill of this modern Delilah was successful, for men stammered out to her their secrets against the promptings of their training and their judgment.

Her daring, too, was as great as her personal fascination. Time and again she penetrated to points behind the French line.

It was after the war that Nemesis overtook this "woman with the smile of a Gloconda and a heart of the hardest rock," as she has been called. Haunted by the ghosts of dead men—men betrayed by her hand and brain—she sought temporary forgetfulness in drugs. But the phantoms remained, and before long the "Blond Lady," now a hopeless drug addict, had lost everything, beauty, charm, reason itself—everything in fact except the insatiable craving for cocaine.

Oil Turns $500 Into Million for Girls

"Worthless" Land Left by Father Brings Fortune.

San Francisco.—Old Dame Fortune has her sentimental moments. She bestowed a $500,000 dowry on a bride of less than two months, it has developed here—and just to keep things even, poured another half million into the lap of a married sister.

The two lucky women are Mrs. Louise W. Dessauer, who became the wife of a local stock broker recently, and Mrs. Cora Nathan Michaels, both of this city.

Ten years ago upon the death of their father, Louis D. Nathan, a promoter, they inherited an estate considered virtually worthless. It was a quarter interest in 100 acres of bleak land in a corner of Kings county, appraised at $500.

The same legacy is now valued at $1,000,000.

The estimate was made in the court of Superior Judge Thomas F. Graham when W. D. Kelley, trust officer for the Wells Fargo Bank and Union Trust company, presented an accounting of the Nathan estate.

The property is located in the Kettlemans Hills oil district, a development barely dreamed of in Nathan's day.

Kelley told the court a half interest in the 100 acres was recently leased to a large oil company for $8,000,000, and would bring the two sisters a yearly rights approximating $1,000,000.

Mrs. Dessauer, in their summer home at Belvidere following the honeymoon, laughingly intimated that the "wedding present" was highly appreciated.

Can Read 5 Miles Away by Novel Searchlight

London.—There is news of the invention of an entirely novel searchlight which throws a beam of light so intense that a newspaper can be read by it at night at a distance of five miles.

The searchlight is the invention of W. H. Pennow, and one of its most astonishing features is that it is able to keep the lamp's rays in a narrow pencil of light. The beam of ordinary searchlights diverges so much that even when lamps of enormous candle power are used their ranges are comparatively short. The Pennow beam is focused much more sharply; at a mile it produces a spot of light only twelve feet in diameter. The searchlight has been designed chiefly to help aviators in night flying, but it has many other uses.

Nail Swallowed by Man 28 Years Ago Removed

Elmer, N. J.—Severe pains in his chest recently startled Edward Snyder, Pennsylvania railroad track foreman living here. Mr. Snyder recalled that twenty-eight years ago, when making tunnels, he had swallowed a nail and so told his doctor.

The nail, now quite rusty, was located by surgeons and removed in a delicate operation at the Episcopal hospital, Philadelphia. They said it must have penetrated the intestinal wall at some point and gradually worked its way upward through Snyder's body until it lodged between his lungs and ribs.

Snyder is recuperating at his home here.

But he is suffering a nervous breakdown because he couldn't find a collar button he purchased recently.

DAIRY FACTS

MONEY FOR OWNER IN GRAIN FEEDING

Figures Show Its Value in Milk Production.

Records from dairy herd improvement associations show that grain fed to good cows makes money for the dairyman.

The average annual yield of milk for dairy cows in New York is 5,500 pounds of milk. A group of cows with less than the average production, or 5,261 pounds of milk, was fed on an average $20 worth of grain, and $35 worth of hay, silage, and pasture, or $55 in all for feed. The average return on all costs of feed, the transaction assuring the dairyman a substantial profit on his investment.

In a group with an average production of 5,500 pounds of milk, the value of the milk was $108. The total feed cost was $71, made up of $30 for grain, and $41 for roughage, and the net return was $35.

A group which produced, on an average, 7,771 pounds of milk, and fed $50 worth of grain and $44 worth of roughage, produced a gross return of $213 against a feed cost of $94, or a net return of $119. Similarly, two other groups, producing about twice the state average in pounds of milk, or 10,254 pounds and 11,937 pounds respectively, were fed $85 and $90 worth of grain, and $42 and $46 worth of roughage, with total feed costs of $127 and $145 as compared with milk values of $280 and $339 each, and net returns of $153 and $194.

Acids in Silage Found Not Harmful to Cows

Claims are frequently made by some groups opposing the use of silage that this feed is harmful to cows because of the acid it contains. No evidence to this effect was found in a carefully controlled experiment conducted by A. E. Perkins and C. F. Monroe of the dairy department at the Ohio experiment station, Wooster.

Four groups of cows were variously fed with two types of rations. One type contained liberal amounts of silage, supplying in some instances nearly one and one-half pounds of the silage acids daily. In the other type the silage was replaced by a five to one mixture of dried beet pulp with molasses, soaked with two and one-half times its weight of water. The latter ration supplied a slightly greater amount of digestible nutrients than did the silage ration but it contained no acids.

Chemical analysis conducted on the urine of the cows in both groups showed only slight differences in composition. There was no indication of an accumulation of acid or an excessive loss of minerals when as much as 50 pounds of silage per day was fed to the animals.

Profits From "Culling"

A certain amount of herd culling would increase the actual profits on many farms. Here is an illustration from a western herd. In February a farmer started to weigh the milk from each cow in his herd and have it tested for butterfat. Also he kept track of his feed costs. The herd returned $27.48 above feed cost. This was only $1.38 for each of his 18 cows, 16 of them in milk. The first of March he sold 8 of these cows to the butcher. The remaining 10 cows, one of which was dry, returned $79.14 above feed costs or $5.92 for each cow. Removing 8 cows more than doubled the above feed cost for the herd, to say nothing of labor saved.

It would not always be safe to base dairy culling on one month's performance unless that one month's verified observations already made. A culling based on one month's performance would be safely accurate and would not represent any great time expenditure either.

Cleanliness Essential

Two things are important in producing clean milk. These are cleanliness and coldness. Cleanliness means a clean cow, clean utensils and a clean dairyman. This does not mean a great deal of extra expense or fancy equipment.

The next greatest essential in clean milk is to cool it quickly enough. Milk should be brought to 50 degrees Fahrenheit or lower within an hour after it is produced. The milk tank seems to be the most satisfactory and cheapest method of cooling milk on the average dairy farm. Clean milk can be produced with a milking machine as readily as by hand providing proper sanitary measures are observed.

DAIRY NOTES

When the pasture begins to shorten up, grain should be added in order to maintain the heavy flow which has been stimulated by grass.

Keeping records on milk production of dairy cows is especially important when the price of milk is low. All low producing cows should be weeded from the herd as soon as detected. Serious losses may thus be prevented.

Dotted Net Is Charming and Chic

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

WHAT with the program of party frocks for the last several summers being mostly a matter of one printed chiffon frock after another, the idea of printed or embroidered cotton net suggests a most intriguing diversion.

The beauty about these very charming new quality-kind cotton nets which are now so smartly in fashion for evening wear is that they can be safely and successfully washed—no danger of colors "running" as heretofore. Then, too, these nets drape ever so charmingly, at the same time having enough body in them to stay crisp and fresh looking on the warmest evening.

Very newest printed nets carry the message that dots have appeared on fashion's horizon for midsummer evenings. For the slender woman the color which is ideal. It is a very "young" frock for slim and svelte youth, and later providing you're the type.

A particularly summery and actually washable durable cotton net fashion this lovely gown. Of course, you will be interested in the deep capelot collar which reminds us that shoulders are generally covered this summer if only with a wisp of a scarf, or a tiny drape which looks as if it might have started to be a sleeve and decided to "just pretend." We mustn't forget to tell you that the dots which pattern this particular dress are in "English Officer" red, from which striking color the hand-made silk apples, which form the corsage take their cue. A slightly stiffened peplum is featured, its hemline following the contour of the skirt hemline with considerable artistry.

Quite as effective, although not so unusual and new as the big coin dots are the charming nets which are patterned with colorful florals. These come in every key from flamboyant rose motifs to demure Dolly Varden flowerettes.

You may have quite a time deciding whether to buy a printed or an embroidered net for your next evening or garden-party frock. Choose either and you will play safe. The inspiring thought in this connection is that through perfected processes these fine quality durable nets no matter how delicate their tones and tints may be or how bold, they may be relied on as being fast color. This means they are not only appealing from an aesthetic point of view, but they are also thoroughly practical.

Is Only a Citizen When He Quits Car

Albany.—A trolley conductor ceases to be a conductor when he leaves the trolley, the Court of Appeals has ruled.

The case was that of John Mack, who had sued the Brooklyn City Railroad company because one of the conductor's conductors had hit him. The company maintained that the conductor had left the car when he smote John and that, ergo, he was no longer their agent—but a private citizen. And the company won.

"Eyes" of the Blind Now Wears Boots

Reginald D. White, blind war veteran, and his faithful German police dog, Wicker. White has rewarded his "eyes," as he calls him, with four boots for his blistered feet that he may guide his master about San Francisco streets on his daily duties. Wicker made his wants known to his charge by putting a hot blistered foot in the hand of White the other day when the mercury soared to nearly the hundred mark.

HATS OF ALL SIZES APPROVED BY PARIS

There is nothing monotonous about hat fashions this summer. Sizes range from mere skull caps to cape lines, with brims a foot wide. There is as much variety in shapes as in sizes and more materials involved than there is room to list. Soft, fabriclike straw, crocheted or mesh straw are the being used for new versions of the beret, and to make crowns for some of the brimmed hats. The familiar panama, bako, milan, leghorn and other well knowns are making all manner of brimmed hats. Stitching is used to give body to cotton and linen hats and to decorate brimmed sports hats of jersey and felt.

Among the small hats Agnes' French colonial creations and Suzanne Talbot's derby-brimmed hats are of particular interest. Agnes has taken the various headgears and hair dresses of the Moroccans, the Algerians, the Canadians and translated them in a collection of peaked and wrapped and draped turbans and berets that are enormously smart. Furthermore, she has taken over the brilliant and exotic colorings that distinguish the original models.

Mesh Stockings Regarded Comfortable for Sports

Do you like lisle for sports stockings? Many women do, because it looks less dressed up and formal. Do you like mesh for sports stockings? Its open work seems "ext most comfortable to bare legs. Lisle and mesh conspire, therefore, to make comfortable, good looking stockings to go with sports costumes. And lisle mesh socks are a joy for tennis.

Socks continue to be worn for active sports, but usually over stockings. Bare legs may be worn for comfort, but only in private and informal places.

With the white clothes and the bright colors you will be wearing this summer you will find that a light clear beige is most becoming. This is the shade that tones best with your outdoor-darkened skin.

Women at Palm Beach adopted this shade almost universally in the daytime. In the evening they wore paler tones—pude and peach.

There is talk of white and off-white hose for wear in the evening.

Stunning Dinner Gown

This is a Lanvin replica of a dinner gown in black. The braided peplum is unique, as are the long satin gauntlets with jeweled bracelets.

Three Colors for Scarf: Worn With White Sports

There are all sorts of attractive scarfs, many of them made of red, white and blue. There are lots of clothes accessories in those colors, anyway. They are worn with white sports clothes.

There are, for instance, scarfs made in triangles of the three colors, oddly chunked together. There are scarfs of the three colors in wide stripes, others with the center portion of the scarf white, the ends striped red and blue. These scarfs, striped and triangles, are made of the finest wool crocheted in a loose, lacy stitch.

Other scarfs are made of the three colors striped lengthwise, in soft silk crepe. Still others are made of two colors on one side, lined with the third color.

THE STORY

With his English wife, Catherine, and son, Jeems, Henry Buin, French settler in Canada in 1749, cultivates a farm adjacent to the Tontour seigneurie. As the story opens the Buins are returning from a visit to the Tontours. Catherine's wandering brother, Hepzibah, meets them with presents for the family. To Jeems he gives a pistol, bidding him perfect himself in marksmanship. Hepzibah fears for the safety of the Buins in their isolated position. Jeems fights with Paul Tache, cousin of Tontour, whom they both adore. Next day Jeems calls at the Tontour home and apologizes for brawling in front of Tontour. The Tontours go to Quebec.

CHAPTER IV—Continued

This discussion was the beginning of another phase in Jeems' life. It placed before him certain definite obligations of manhood which even his mother had to recognize, though she wanted to hold him as long as possible in his boyhood years. During the next year he made several trips with Hepzibah, going to Albany and as far as the country of Pennsylvania. Each time he returned to his home something held him more closely to it. In the autumn of 1754, after four years at school, Tontour returned to Tontour manor.

Peace and happiness lay over the Richelieu. It had been a splendid year for France along the far frontiers. Washington had surrendered at Fort Mifflin, and Villiers was triumphant at Fort Duquesne. England and France were still playing at the hypocrisy of friendship. While they played, thrusting at each other secretly and in the dark, an English flag was left waving beyond the Alleghenies. French arms and Indian diplomacy were victorious along the Ohio and westward to the plains. The policies of the British royal governors were alienating their Indian allies, and in spite of their million and a half population against eighty thousand in New France, Dinwiddie had frantically called upon England for help. In response, England was sending General Braddock.

In a double rejoicing over Tontour's homecoming and his country's success at arms, Tontour planned a levee and barbecue at the seigneurie. Hepzibah was away at the time, which disappointed the baron, who insisted that Henri and his family must attend the celebration or he would never call them friends again.

Jeems felt a thrill growing in him as the day drew near. He was no longer the Jeems of Lussan's place as he set out in the company of his father and mother with Odd pegging along faithfully at his side. In January he would be eighteen. The air of the wilds was in his movements. Catherine was more than ever proud of him and rejoiced in the cleanliness of his build, in his love of nature and God, and in the directness with which his eyes looked at one. But she was not more proud than Hepzibah Adams, who had seen in this pupil of his flesh and blood the qualities and courage, the lock, stock, and barrel, as he called it, of a fighting man.

Jeems was anxious to see Tontour, but with this desire there remained none of the old animosity which had once oppressed him. She whom he was going to regard today was a stranger, one into whose presence he was determined not to force himself again. This resolution was not inspired in him by a lack of boldness or an uncertainty as to his own social fitness. An immense pride upheld him. The spirit and freedom of the forests were in his blood, and behind there was also the spirit of Hepzibah Adams. He knew that he could meet Tontour coolly and without embarrassment should they chance to meet face to face, no matter how splendid she had grown. And he realized there must be a great change in her. She was fifteen now. A young lady. At this period of his life, five years seemed a long time, and he thought it was possible he might not recognize her.

An overwhelming moment of shock seized him when at last he saw her. It was as if a yesterday of long ago had come back into this today, as if a picture which had been burned and scattered into ash had miraculously been restored. She was taller, of course. Perhaps she was lovelier. But she was the same Tontour. He could see no change in her except that she had become more a woman. Hepzibah's work, his own, his freedom, and his courage were dissipated like dust as he looked at her, and once more he felt himself the inferior being offering her nuts and feathers and maple sugar and praying in his childish way that she might smile on him. This was not a new Tontour removed another million miles away from him, as he had supposed she would be, but the old Tontour, commanding him to slavery again, and making his blood run hot in his body.

With a group of young ladies from the neighboring seigneurie, she had come down from the big house, and he was almost in her path, with Peter Lubeck at his side. It was Peter who advanced a step or two toward them. Except for his action Tontour would not have turned, and stood with his head bowed, as cold and impassive in appearance as a soldier at attention, while his heart beat like a hammer. Tontour had to face him to return his companion's greeting.

It was impossible for her not to see him when she made this movement. But there was a slowness in her discovery, an effort to keep from looking at him which was more eloquent than words. It had not been her desire to speak to him.

If he needed courage, it was this enlightenment which gave it to him. He inclined his head when she met his gaze. Her face was flushed, her eyes darkly aglow, while his own cheeks bore only the color of sun and wind. He might never have known her, so unmoved did he stand as she went on her way.

She had slightly nodded, her lips had barely formed a name.

Later, after the feast on the green, came Tontour's spectacular review of the day, a military review of his tenants, with wives and children witnessing the martial display. The male guests, who had drilled in their own seigneuries, joined Tontour's men. Only Henri Buin and Jeems were not among them. Henri, sensitive to the fact, and to save Catherine from the hurt which might arise because of it, had started with her over the homeward trail half an hour before. Jeems had remained. This was his answer to Tontour's contempt—that he was not of her people, that his world was not circumscribed by the petty boundaries of the seigneurie. He stood with his long rifle in the crook of his arm, conscious that she was looking at him, and the invisible shafts from her eyes, poisoned with their disdain, stirred him with the thrill of a painful triumph. He could almost hear her calling him an English beast again. A coward. One to be distrusted and watched. He did not sense humiliation or regret, but only a final widening of what had always lain between them.

He bore this feeling home with him. It grew as time went on, and with its growth an increasing restlessness came over him. News creeping through the wilderness and reaching every corner, like the whispering winds, kept an unquenchable heat under the ash of these fires, fanning the embers into flame in spite of him. Secrets were no longer secrets. Rumors had grown into facts. Fears had become realities. England and France were still playing at peace in their mighty courts. In the sunlight they were friends, in the dark they were seeking each other's lives like common cutthroats.

And the thirteen little Colonial governments of the English, quarreling like small boys among themselves, just beginning to walk alone, feeling the significance of the new word American, cheated by their parent, laughed at by their parent, hated by their parent, still yearned for the love of that parent as children have wanted love from the beginning of time, and were loyal to it.

So tragedy began to move, to build out of death, out of betrayed confidence, out of dishonor and fraud and pitiless murder the American and Canadian nations of the future.

Eighty thousand French and more than a million English in the New world made ready for the sacrifice. Massachusetts enlisted one man out of eight of her male population. Connecticut, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New York, and the others followed her example.

Children, loyal, proud to fight—and hating the French ferociously! Then came Braddock, preceding Wolfe, to call them "worthless trash." And New France, a glory of sun and land even now gutted of her prosperity by corruptions brought and sent out her sons to fight and kill, valiant, glad, confident—and hating the English implacably!

With them, on both sides, went Indians from almost a hundred tribes—men who had once fought honor in fighting, but who, now skulking and murdering and venal, found their souls in pawn to the great White Fathers across the sea who had prostituted them with whiskey, bought them with guns, maddened them with hatreds, and who paid them for human hair.

Of these things Jeems was thinking as winter grew into spring and spring into summer. Only love held him from leaping to the temptations which were drawing closer about him, love for his mother whose happiness marked the beginning and the end of all action on the part of her menfolk. And in this hour, when three out of four of the fighting men along the Richelieu were preparing to join Dieskau, when half of his acquaintances at the Tontour seigneurie had already gone to fight Braddock, when the forests trembled at the stealthy tread of painted savages, and when the Frenchman who did not rise to his country's call was no longer a Frenchman, Jeems observed that the strain upon his father was more difficult to bear than his own.

In spite of his worship of Catherine, in the heart of Jeems lay the bottom of the soul, and now that other men were making a bulwark of their bodies against her enemies, his own desire to make the same sacrifice was almost beyond the power of his strong will to control. In their years of exile, ship, Jeems and his father had never come so near to each other as in these weeks of tension.

Almost as painful to them as the sting of a wound was the day when Dieskau came up the Richelieu with a host of three thousand five hundred men and made forever a hallowed ground of the Tontour seigneurie by camping there overnight.

When she knew they were coming, Catherine had said:

"If your hearts tell you it is right, go with them!"

But they remained. For Henri it was a struggle greater than Dieskau fought, greater than that in which Braddock died. For Jeems it was less a torment and more the mysterious madness of youth to tramp to the clash of arms. For Catherine it was the gehenna of her life, a siege of darkness and uncertainty in her soul which gave way suddenly before the land which swept like a whirlwind over the land.

God had been with New France! Braddock and his English invaders were destroyed! No triumph of French arms in the New world had been so complete, and Dieskau, the great German baron who was fighting for France, moved southward to crush Sir William Johnson and his Colonials and Indians, planning not to stop until he had driven them to the doors of Albany.

With him were six hundred and eighty-four of the loyal men who were beginning to call themselves Canadians.

Tontour rode over to bring the news to Henri Buin. To Catherine he recalled the prediction that the English would never get into this paradise of theirs. Now the whole thing was settled for many years to come, for Dieskau had won their least enemy from the Champlain country as completely as a new broom swept her home. He had sent almost every man he had to the scene of fighting, and only his wooden leg had kept him from joining Dieskau.

Even Tontour had wanted to go! (TO BE CONTINUED.)

High Place Accorded Majestic Douglas Fir

A Scottish naturalist, roving the wild western land of the infant republic 108 years ago, brought the majestic Douglas fir to the knowledge of the scientific world, and for all time it will bear his name. Of David Douglas it is said that he "contributed probably more than any other one man to the knowledge of our northwestern trees and plants."

Returning home, he introduced the Douglas fir into cultivation in Great Britain, and the Scots value it highly for fish and furniture. Now comes the sequel, in this editorial paragraph from the Seattle Times:

"A shipment of a cargo of Seattle-made furniture to Scotland has more than ordinary significance. The articles are all made of Washington fir, a wood held in higher esteem in Scotland than walnut. The purchasers specified that the wood should be of its natural grain, which everybody knows is beautiful. We are familiar with the cargoes usually exported from this state, but when a new line and new market are involved there is good reason to rejoice."

America's Largest Island
Isle Royale, Michigan's beautiful island in Lake Superior, often is spoken of as "the second largest island in the United States." Long Island, N. Y., being the largest island. But the second largest is Whidby Island, belonging to the state of Washington, according to the American Geographical society. Whidby Island lies across the entrance to Puget sound and is so little known that geographers and atlas makers differ on the spelling of its name.

Gold Mixture
Green gold consists of gold, silver and cadmium, and sometimes copper is also added. The degree of the green color depends upon the percentage of the metals used with the gold.

Advocates Wheat as Substitute for Corn

Expert Advises Its Use in Rations of Hogs.

Proving an excellent substitute for corn in the hog ration, wheat may be fed with profit as long as its price stays near its present level and does not cost more than 10 to 12 cents more per bushel than corn, states J. W. Wulcher, specialist at Ohio State university.

As a feed for hogs, wheat is worth about 6 to 8 per cent more than the same weight of shelled corn and may be substituted entirely for corn in the ration, according to Wulcher. In fact, some tests show that greater returns are obtained by feeding wheat alone with some good protein supplement than by mixing large amounts of corn in the ration.

To get the most out of wheat, Wulcher believes that it is best ground or crushed, preferably the latter, as grinding fine does not improve the digestibility and only adds to the cost. Soaking wheat improves it about 1 per cent, but grinding adds about 10 per cent to its value.

As wheat contains more protein than does corn, less protein is necessary to balance it. Corn, he says, requires about 10 per cent tankage to balance it and wheat requires about 8 per cent. So by feeding wheat good results may be obtained although less tankage and other high protein feeds are used.

No More Useful Feed Than Silage on Farm

Silage is one of the most useful feeds that is produced on the average farm. The entire crop is preserved with much less cost than from any other method in handling. Good clean silage that is free from mold is greatly relished by all classes of live stock. With corn silage and alfalfa hay as the basal ration, supplemented with linseed meal and corn, experiments at the Michigan State college experiment station, as well as at other experiment stations, have shown that considerable grain may be saved by inducing the calves to eat more silage and hay in the early part of the feeding period. When starting on feed, calves weighing 375 to 400 pounds will gain practically as fast for the first two months with about six pounds of grain and all the silage they care to eat as if they are eating eight to ten pounds of grain and considerably less silage. In fact, calves fed six and one-half to seven months gained almost as fast and were practically as fat when fed approximately two-thirds as much corn as other calves that ate from a self-feeder. The selling price was the same two years out of three.

Lack of Protein Cause of Rooting by Pigs

Pigs fed a ration deficient in protein rooted more and more as the length of the feeding period extended at the Ohio experiment station. Pigs which had a good ration with plenty of protein and salt rooted very little, according to W. L. Robinson, reporting his year's research work.

Fish meal again proved to be the most economical protein supplement for corn fed to growing pigs. Minerals added 18 per cent gain when fed with corn alone and reduced the feed required 13 per cent. No protein supplement was used.

Ground oats were more productive than whole oats with tankage and alfalfa. A ration of ground corn, oats, tankage and minerals proved to be more profitable than the corn-oat combination. Cost of production was $6.92 a hundred. Hulling oats was not profitable for pigs.

Ordinary cottonseed meal fed to pigs with the regular corn ration did not do well. Some died after the 46th day. Special cottonseed meal furnished the pigs a good protein supplement and on which they did well.

O. P. V. Suitable for Either Silage or Hay

At one of the Dominion experimental stations in Ontario an experiment has been conducted for a period of years to determine the best time for sowing a mixture of oats, peas and vetch (O.P.V.) for silage or hay. The mixture used was two bushels of oats, one bushel of peas and one-half bushel of vetch per acre. The seed was sown on six different dates each year, at intervals of seven days. The average date of the first seeding over a six-year period was May 23. The average date of the last seeding, June 27.

The experiments showed that good yields may be grown either for silage or hay; that the earlier seedings produce the better yields; yet very good results may be obtained even from seedling later in the summer. Hence, the crop may be grown even on low-lying land, slow to dry up in the spring.

Around the Farm

Nearly half the world's population, uses soy beans daily as a protein food.

The amount of oats that can be fed hogs, sheep and chickens is limited. Oats has a place in every laying ration.

Government scientists are experimenting with wheat and oat straw in an endeavor to make use of these farm products in the manufacture of high quality paper.

Lesson for August 23

A GOSPEL FOR ALL MEN

LESSON TEXT—Acts 10:1-11:18.
GOLDEN TEXT—For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek; for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Gospel for Everybody.
JUNIOR TOPIC—The Gospel for Everybody.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—First Steps in World Brotherhood.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Gospel for All Men.

In the lesson for August 2 we saw the missionary program of the church broadened to include the Samaritans. We see in this lesson the program still widening and embracing the Gentiles. The conversion of Cornelius illustrates the breaking down of "the middle wall of partition" (Eph. 2:14).

1. Cornelius (10:1, 2). He was a Roman officer over a company of one hundred soldiers.
2. His character (v. 2). A devout, pious man. b. A praying man. c. A charitable man.

11. The Supernatural Preparation for the Transition of the Gospel to the Gentiles (10:3-38).

1. Two visions were given (vv. 8-10). (a). The vision of Cornelius (vv. 3-8). While engaged in prayer an angel of God announced that his prayer and alms had come before God as a memorial and instructed him to send to Joppa for Peter who would tell him what to do. (b). The vision of Peter (vv. 9-10). This took place while Peter was praying (v. 9). He saw a certain vessel containing clean and unclean animals let down from heaven, and heard the command, "Rise, Peter, kill and eat." This vision indicated that both Jews and Gentiles were accepted on high.

2. A messenger sent from Cornelius (vv. 17-22). Peter was greatly perplexed over what he had seen, but not for long, for messengers from Cornelius made inquiry at the gate for him. The Spirit informed Peter of the matter and bade him go, nothing doubting.

3. The meeting of Cornelius and Peter (vv. 23-33). (a). Peter took six witnesses along (v. 23). He had the good judgment to know that on a matter of so great importance he must have witnesses. (b). Cornelius waiting for Peter (v. 24). He had such confidence in God's instruction that he called to gather his kinsmen and friends to be ready on Peter's arrival. (c). Cornelius about to worship Peter (vv. 25, 26). Peter repudiated his act and protested that he himself was but a man. (d). The reciprocal explanation (vv. 27-33). Peter explained to him how God had taken from him his Jewish prejudice and asked why Cornelius had sent for him. Cornelius explained that God had instructed him to send for Peter.

111. Peter's Sermon (vv. 34-43). 1. The introduction (vv. 34, 35). He showed that God is no respecter of persons but that in every nation those that fear God and work righteously are accepted of him. This does not mean that Cornelius was already in a state of grace, and therefore saved, but that he was eligible to hear the gospel and accept the terms of salvation.

2. His discourse (vv. 36-43). In the discourse he touches briefly upon the mission of Jesus, showing that by means of his baptism and the anointing of the Holy Spirit he was qualified for his work as mediator. He then exhibited the work of Christ: (a). In his life (vv. 36-38). He went about doing good, even casting out demons, as a proof that God was with him. (b). In his death (v. 39). The just suffered for the unjust that he might bring us to God (1 Pet. 3:18). (c). In his resurrection (vv. 40, 41). God raised him up on the third day showing openly that Christ was his Son (Rom. 1:4) and that his sacrificial work was satisfactory (Rom. 4:25). In this discourse is set forth (1) The basis of salvation—the crucifixion of Christ. (2) The scope of salvation—whosoever believeth in him. (3) The method of appropriating salvation—believing on him.

IV. The Holy Spirit Poured Out (vv. 44-48).

This was a new Pentecost. As the gospel was entering upon its widest mission, the Spirit came in new power.

V. Peter Vindicates His Ministry to the Gentiles (11:1-18). Being called to account for having visited and eaten with Gentiles, Peter rehearsed the whole story showing how God had set his seal upon the work by the miraculous gift of the Spirit.

Ingratitude

The saddest example of ingratitude is the poverty of the thankfulness of those who are, in some measure, thankful for God's greatest gift. It is strange and melancholy that Christians should love, and love so little; should be thankful, and so tepid in it.—Alexander Macdaren.

The Heavenly Father's Love

Our heavenly Father is no Elit: He will not suffer his children to sin without rebuke. His love is too intense for that.—Spurgeon.

YEARLY MEETING WAS WELL ATTENDED

Rev. Smith of Ashley. The County Men's Chorus under the direction of Mr. Hendershot sang several special numbers during the afternoon which added much to the enjoyment of the meeting.

Mr. Walker's afternoon address was "The Church of the Future." Again he took the stream of the faithful on down into the future, urging Christ's people to be faithful to Him and to His teaching, in order to assure to the future of the church as strong as the apostolic church of Christ's day. After the singing of the Old Rugged Cross by the Men's Chorus, the ordinance of the Lord's Supper was observed with breaking of bread and with prayer.

The worship period of the afternoon session closed with a feeling on the part of all that it is good for brethren to get together in meetings of this kind and that all were better from having been there. Next year's meeting will be held at Ashley with the following officers in charge: President, Ross Mann; vice president, Glen Myers; secretary and treasurer, Homer Casebeer.

Secretary Says Largest Agricultural Exhibit Ever Held in Middle West At Indiana State Fair This Year

E. J. Barker, secretary-treasurer of the Indiana Board of Agriculture, has indicated that he is confident that an unusually large number of exhibits will be shown at the 1931 State Fair, September 5 to 12. He says:

"Prospects for the 1931 Indiana State Fair are very encouraging from the standpoint of exhibits. Not during recent years has there been as much inquiry so early regarding premium lists and the filing of entries. Livestock breeders have an abundant grain and fruit crop all over the state insures a large exhibit in these departments.

"Features for entertainment will not be lacking, as we have the usual grand circuit races each day, with harness races each night on the lighted track. A three ring circus will be given each night in front of the new grandstand, closing with a fireworks display.

"The last Saturday will be featured by new attractions never before seen at this fair. Instead of auto races, you will have opportunity to witness one of the greatest displays of military aerial maneuvers and formations ever given, as well as a chance to see an airplane perform its amazing stunts. There will be other freak acts and the evening closing event, known as the 'Big Crash' which is a collision of two large locomotives in front of the grandstand. These engines meet at a forty mile an hour speed. All of this can be seen from within the grandstand.

"Everyone will want to see the new grandstand, the best of its kind in the world, no danger of fire or collapse and a model of perfection.

First Christian Church
There is much difference of opinion as to what year the first Christian church was actually built. Many historians are of the opinion that the first church to be actually built was at Antioch, probably about A. D. 50.

Profundity
One distinction nowadays is to write a book so incomprehensible that at least a dozen interpreters, who think they know more than the author, will write explanations of the original text. —Richmond Times-Dispatch.

ANDREW SPONHOUR PASSES AWAY SUNDAY NIGHT

Andrew Emanuel Sponhour, a retired farmer and lifelong resident of Jackson township, passed away at midnight Sunday at the late home from cancer.

Mr. Sponhour had been in failing health for a year but had only been bedfast the last two days. Born January 12, 1854, on the old homestead where he died, Mr. Sponhour was aged 77 years, 7 months and 19 days at the time of death. He was the son of Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Sponhour.

In 1884 the deceased married Miss Cora Huffman. To this union was born seven children, five now living and two, Charles and Ada, deceased. The living children are Clarence Sponhour of Jackson township; Mrs. Zula Gerig of Jackson township; Mrs. Mary McNutt of Auburn; Mrs. Minnie Musser, Auburn and Mrs. Grace Baker of Spencer.

Mr. Sponhour has spent his entire life on the old homestead with the exception of a number of winters in Florida. He has been making these trips south every year for the last twelve or fourteen years.

TWO IN ARMORED TRUCK KILLED BY B. & O. TRAIN

Baltimore & Ohio passenger train No. 10, with L. B. Hart of Garrett, as engineer, struck an armored truck at 89th street and Ashland avenue in Chicago last Friday and two men were killed. The truck was carrying about $10,000 in cash collected from south side branch offices of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. When the collision occurred the silver and currency were scattered along the right of way as the truck was hurled 200 feet.

Two other guards following in an escort coupe gathered up most of the money, but it was possible that part of it was stolen by some of the hundreds of spectators who flocked to the scene.

Raymond Hengles, 35, who was riding in the interior of the truck was instantly killed. James Perkins, the messenger in charge of the crew died soon after he was taken to the Little Company of Mary Hospital.

The driver, William O'Brien, 30, received a skull fracture and other injuries which make his recovery doubtful.

O'Brien, driving south in Ashland avenue, apparently did not see the flashing light which is the warning at the crossing and drove into the path of the train. Less than a month ago the Capitol Limited demolished one of the fire department's gasoline trucks at the same crossing.

Mr. Hart told police that he applied his brakes when the truck drove onto the track, but was too close to stop. He continued his run, after being notified to return to Chicago for the coroner's inquest.

The locomotive was not badly damaged, but the train was delayed thirty minutes by the accident.

DELIGHT IN BREAKING THE PUBLIC FOUNTAIN

The matter of keeping the public fountain in running order, has almost become a burden to the town, due to rough treatment given the pump by children and older ones.

The town council believes that our folks ought to appreciate this convenience enough to refrain from trying to wreck it, causing considerable expense in repair.

Information leading to the conviction of the guilty party who ruined the pump last week will be rewarded. Parents are asked to warn their children, large or small, about destroying the public property.

Many strangers use this drinking fountain daily, and when out of commission it gives the town a very unpleasant recommendation.

PATENTS

Sell your patent or invention by exhibiting your model or drawing at the Second and Greater International Patent Exposition, Chicago. Thousands of manufacturers and patent buyers will inspect new devices and patents for marketing. Very low rates. If you have no model, drawings and description will do. Send for free pamphlet. B. Hamilton Edison, Managing Director, International Patent Exposition, Merchandise Mart, Chicago. 324.

Joe Shull graduated from Chicago University with a Master's Degree, last Friday. Mrs. O. K. Shull, son Frank and daughter, Virginia and Mrs. Kathryn Haller of South Bend, attended the commencement exercises.

Sealing Wax Lesson

First take your stick of silver wax and hold it near the lamp so as to heat it enough to drop a few drops on a round tag. Cover the tag with silver wax, all but the hole in the tag, which we will leave for the cord. After you have one side covered, turn the tag over and run the other side. Then the rim on both sides. Be sure to have both sides smooth and if it is lumpy looking, heat the wax enough to run it on smooth.

Next take a stick of purple wax and drop one drop on the tag like number one in drawing. Let it cool, remember this, or your drops, or grapes, will all run together. When it is cool drop another drop beside it, and still another. Keep putting on drops until your design begins to look like a cluster of grapes like number two.

Then come the leaves. They may be fashioned out of green wax with a paring knife or piece of wood. Put a leaf on each side of the cluster like number three. Isn't it pretty? With a lavender cord looped through the hole and either a knot or bend to hold cord together and the ends of cord joined with a drop of purple sealing wax, you have a pendant mother will enjoy wearing.

There is another kind that I am going to tell you about now as it can be put to different uses. Take a medium size tag and with your ruler mark it off so it will look like figure A in the drawing.

Then with a sharp knife cut out the center of the tag, leaving the four sides as pictured. Cover both sides with pretty sealing wax, let us say the gold wax, and put it on a little thicker than you did the basket pendant. Put a few roses and leaves on one side of the pendant like figure B.

Bobby Goats

Two little brothers, Billy and Bobby, were walking with Mother one day. When "Look!" she called out. And turned round-about. "There's a Billy-goat coming this way!" And baby Bobby, clinging to mother, broke into a happy boo-hoo. And cried, "I don't care. It's not a bit fair. Cause there ought to be Bobby-goats, too!"

Russia Builds Apartment Houses for Workers

In this, the first aerial view taken of Moscow, Russia, the extremely modern apartment dwellings in the Usmancheva district are shown. The buildings, erected by the government for workers, are so laid out as to admit the most air and light possible to all the dwellers. The ground on which the buildings stand was former waste land.

The Kitchen Cabinet

One may fail, but he fails by himself. Falls by himself with himself to blame. One may attain and to him is the self. Lost of the city in gold or fame; Plunder of earth shall be his own Who travels fastest and travels alone. —Kipling.

SECRET OF GOOD FROSTINGS

The secret of good frostings and fillings for cakes is no secret at all—just use good material, a little care and a good recipe; here are a few:

Baked Frosting.—Beat together two cups of sugar, two tablespoons of light corn sirup and one-half cup of water until the sirup spins a thread. Pour it very slowly over two stiffly beaten eggs whites, flavor with one teaspoonful of vanilla and beat until thick enough to spread well. To vary the recipe, add chopped nuts, raisins, figs or dates. Also coconut of various colors may be used to dust the top and sides.

Fudge Frosting.—Cut fine two squares of chocolate and combine with two cups of sugar, one-half cup of milk and one-fourth cup of dark corn sirup. Cook until it forms a very soft ball when dropped into cold water. Remove from the fire, set the pan in cold water and cool, then flavor and beat until thick enough to spread on the cake. For those who prefer maple flavoring use either maple sugar or the maple flavor instead of the chocolate.

Tropical Filling.—Put one-fourth cup of sugar, one tablespoonful of cornstarch and one-fourth teaspoonful of salt into a double boiler; when well blended add a half cupful of sliced orange peel, one-half cupful of orange juice, two tablespoons of butter and one egg yolk; cook until smooth and thick. Remove from the heat, add a teaspoonful of lemon juice and spread on the layers of the cake.

Spring Conserve.—Cook one and one-half pounds of rhubarb, cut into one-inch pieces with three cups of sugar, one package of dates, two tablespoons of orange juice and one tablespoonful of grated orange rind; cook until thick, adding one-half cupful of broken nutmeats ten minutes before taking off the fire. Pour into jelly glasses and cover with paraffin. (© 1921, Western Newspaper Union.)

did it blinded by perspiration and chased by man-eating flies I now discovered that Connecticut is not only hilly, but that the hills run only one way, and that is up. No wonder New Englanders are a sturdy race. I think we passed the spring again, but I am not sure. Anyhow, we came at last to the main road and proceeding from there eventually got back to where we had been so comfortable and peaceful. Looking back at it, I can see that Gene Tunney is right. Exercise is a great thing. I must take another walk soon—say in about 1935.

LIGHTS OF NEW YORK—By WALTER TRUMBULL

We were sitting in most comfortable chairs, in the side yard where one could see miles of Connecticut roll itself away in green undulations to distant hills. On our own hilltop, the sun fell, just properly filtered by trees, in pleasant and lazy warmth. I could have stayed there for hours in contemplative contentment, but life is never as perfect as that. The big, powerful blond, sprawled opposite me, turned handsome, but rather accusing blue eyes in my direction.

"You need exercise," he said a bit sternly. "Come on, we'll go for a walk."

Now that was a bit unfair, because, as he very well knew, I had taken a walk with him a short time before. It was, to be exact, only some four years ago, when he was a speculator, doing a bit of training for Jack Dempsey. He coaxed me out on a wooded road and walked me ten miles and well I remember it. A fellow has to take a little rest after a walk such as that. But, after all, he was my host and, if he was set on walking all the time, it was only polite to go with him. Besides, Rolfe, the German police dog, voted emphatically, with voice and tail, in favor of the proposition, so they were two to one.

Now, frankly, I like walking about as much as I do creamed codfish, and I can't say less than that, but Gene Tunney and Rolfe and I started down the road from that lovely old house and, at first, it was not so bad. Even when we turned into a wooded road, which leads across the Tunney land, the going appeared to be fairly easy; especially as our progress was leisurely. We made one stop to recall Rolfe, who had started a partridge hunt, and another while he drank from a cool and bubbling spring; but, about a mile beyond, I noticed what I thought was a sudden rain, only to discover that it was perspiration. I paused a moment to wring out the handkerchief with which I had mopped my brow and Rolfe improved the rest period by leaping back and forth over a tree, which had fallen across the road with branches supporting its trunk about four feet from the ground.

The woods were full of a peculiar buzzing sound, which I recognized. I had often heard it in the Adirondacks, where they also have black flies. A black fly belongs to the army of the unemployed. It always is looking for a meal. As Mr. Tunney broke off a small branch and proceeded to brush a few dozen of the hungry insects off Rolfe, I suggested that he might also do a bit of work on me. Evidently these were carillon flies, as they were doing their best to bore through to a brain which must have been dead, or it never would have permitted me to be led to the bottom of a long hill, up which one had to climb to get back home. Gazing at the long return slope, I said:

"Didn't you say Sam Pryor was coming over? It wouldn't be very polite if you were not there when he arrived."

"That means you want to go back," said Mr. Tunney unfeelingly. "Well, all right. You have had a little exercise, anyhow."

So we turned about and started back. I knew a number of men who have climbed the Alps, but they never

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"Blue-Blood"

"HIS a blue-blood" we occasionally hear somebody, the sense sought to be conveyed being that the person referred to is descended of royal or noble blood.

Lately, the phrase has come to be employed to indicate high breeding and it has come into common usage with this connotation.

The expression itself came to us from Spain, country of caste.

Originally, however, it did not have the distinct reference it has today, as indicated. It was used simply to denote one free from the so-called Moorish taint, arising from the fact that in fair races, the veins very frequently show blue through the skin.

My Neighbor

Says:

WHEN rendering fats for cooking purposes, chop the fat fine, place it in a double boiler and add plenty of cold water. Keep the water in double boiler boiling until the fat is melted. If you have not a double boiler, put the fat in a jar and place the jar in hot water.

Old pillow cases make excellent covers to protect gowns. Cut a hole in the center of stitched end of pillow case large enough to slip through the hanger on which gowns will hang.

Cold water is much better than warm for scrubbing boards, as it does not sink into the wood and dries very quickly.

IRA BONE CELEBRATES

On last Monday, our neighbor, Mr. Ira Bone, a farmer west of St. Joe, got up feeling cheery and told his wife that being as his birthday was this week he would show her and the world that he was just as good a man as he ever was. He threw out his chest and took his corn cutter in hand and said, "Now I'm going out to cut a shock of corn for every year I am old today." Ira cut 64 shocks, according to Father Time's record and pulled a successful feat. Mr. Bone said he done it alright but he reckons as how he will hold some other kind of a celebration next year. He says 65 shocks will be too many. For the rest of the week he has declared a moratorium to rest himself up. Ira now avers and allows that the spirit is indeed willing but that the flesh is weak.

GETTING BUSINESS GLOOM BEHIND US

By ROME C. STEPHENSON President American Bankers Association

THERE is such a thing as over-staying a depression just as there is of over-staying a boom. Over-confidence makes the great majority miss the turn in a boom, and under-confidence makes them miss it in a depression.

R. C. STEPHENSON

A leading New York banker was asked recently when he could tell that a turn for the better had come. "About three months after it has happened," he candidly replied. "There is more significance in that remark than appears on the surface. As more and more manufacturers and business men realize that the turn has already come and that they are over-staying the time to adopt constructive policies, they begin cautiously to press their selling campaigns, to speed up their production, to increase their working forces and increase their commitments for supplies. It is the gathering weight of their influences that finally raises the pressure of confidence to the dynamic power of recovery."

The surest way to bring the nation out of the business depression is to raise the pressure of public confidence to the point of becoming such a dynamic force. It has invariably been the push of that force which has started recovery in the past, and it is the gathering power of this force which will start recovery from this present depression.

It is a favorable sign of the times that there seems to be general agreement that the bottom of the depression has been reached and all eyes are peeled and looking ahead for the first indications that the turn for the better is in sight. Who knows but what the first thing we know we will find ourselves looking backward instead of forward as we realize that the turn has already come. It is a rough and rocky road that runs across the bottom of the valley of business depression, and most of us are too busy steering the old Ford from bump to bump to be able to take in all the scenery. So who knows but what some important changes in the landscape are already taking place.

BANKERS FAVOR GRADUAL CHANGE

National Commission Believes Local Sentiment Should Govern Evolution in Methods of Conducting Banking.

If substantial changes are to be brought about in branch banking in the United States they should originate within the states rather than from Washington on inter-state lines as proposed in "trade area" branch banking plans, a recent report of the Economic Policy Commission of the American Bankers Association declares. Such changes, it adds, "should develop by evolutionary rather than revolutionary stages."

"The extension of branch banking through state action would mean that states not now permitting state banks to have branches or else closely restricting them, would individually liberalize their laws as an expression of changing local desires and conditions, and this doubtless would insure a deliberate, evolutionary process," the report says. "The other method, that is, through Federal action, would mean a sweeping change for the country as a whole, for legislation granting branch banking powers to national banks in all states, regardless of local sentiment, would, of course, induce equivalent branch banking enactments in every state in the Union not now permitting or really wanting state banks to have branches, in order to keep them on a competitive equality."

Upholds State Privileges "We find some bankers who feel that a proper stimulus to the development of branch banking would be given by the Federal Government taking the initiative through granting broader privileges within state lines to national banks than they now enjoy. It is argued that state governments could then follow suit as to state banks and that in this way a more progressive branch banking attitude might be promoted by the national banks taking the lead. While we do not deny that there may be some merit in this view as to some specific localities, we stand firm nevertheless on the principle that no such grant of powers to national banks should cross state lines, or exceed the privileges that state legislatures could and would grant to their state banks."

"Moreover we believe that if the choice between these two possible courses of extending branch banking were put up to bankers they would be generally opposed to any forcible imposition of branch banking on the states through the medium of the national bank system. We believe it would be preferable for any change to come about through the more gradual and democratic method of the states granting their banks branch banking powers state by state where, it, and as local conditions and sentiment might be ready for a change."

SOME HELPFUL TONIC Prescribed by Our Physician

From now on we will learn to be satisfied with fewer and simpler things.

A man can't get a job as engineer of a peanut roaster these days unless he has a high school education. Competition.

Will the next hemorrhage of prosperity bring a new rejuvenation of spirituality in the churches when it arrives?

Radio frequencies: Ball outside. Here comes the next pitch. Strike-right over the old pan. Bush is now rubbing the new ball around in his hand—here comes the pitch. A line drive—Hack is going for it. He can't get it—its a home run—its a home run, etc.

Did it ever occur to the average person that the prevailing commercial organized society has a tendency to destroy individuality in America? The business slogan is: Know nothing, see nothing, be nothing, hear nothing, say nothing, smell nothing, write nothing, think nothing, believe nothing unless it comes from the Ancient and Independent Order of Gold Diggers, (commonly known as big business.) The customer is always right and the clerk is always wrong in the deal. Religion, conscience, morals, duty to a neighbor, a square deal, etc., are not to be considered. Sell your individuality and your soul to the god of commerce and business. "Be a bird in a gilded cage." Commercialism is the enemy of spiritualism, undeniably true.

Don't any of you young saps get it into your heads that you had better drop out of school and get a job or get married. This is a day for youngsters to do a little thinking for themselves. In the first place there are no jobs open for young or old people who are not educated. And in the second place there are no jobs open for anybody at the present. As a high school student said recently, "I may as well go on thru school because there is no work and when I graduate then this depression will be over, and I will be all set then to swing a real job." This is good foresight and common sense on the part of young people. Go to school at the school age and work when you come to the work age. That's system. That's business. That's sensible. That's head work.

Indiana State Fair Best in Country, Says Gov. Leslie

"The value of the Indiana State Fair to the people of the State becomes greater every year. Magnificent modern buildings made possible by the generous cooperation of various legislatures have gradually taken the place of ancient sheds. Today, with the completion of the Grandstand, the Indiana State Fair is the peer of any like institution in the nation."

"The wisdom and foresight of the Indiana State Board of Agriculture have made the State Fair one of the most powerful influences for rural education and betterment. Through the girls' Home Economics school, conducted during the Fair; the recognition of 4-H Club activities, the most remote communities of the state have been reached."

"Liberal premiums for every line of human endeavor encourage every true Hoosier to make the most of his opportunities. Rich purses bring the cream of the harness racing fraternity to the Grand Circuit Races. Massive porkers, majestic horses, gentle kine and woolly sheep testify to the skill of the modern farmer. Rich pastries and beautiful needlework bear witness to housewifely skill. Lovers of art are inspired by the beautiful exhibits encouraged by the Fair."

"I can not too strongly commend the Indiana State Fair. I wish it were possible for every one to visit it."

THE STORY

With his English wife, Catherine, and son, Jeems, Henry Du-lain, French settler in Canada in 1748, cultivates a farm adjacent to the Tontour seigneurie. As the story opens the Du-lains are returning from a visit to the Tontours. Catherine's wandering brother, Hespibah, meets them with presents for the family. To Jeems he gives a pistol, bidding him perfect himself in marksmanship. Hespibah fears for the safety of the Du-lains in their isolated position. Jeems fights with Paul Tache, cousin of Toinette Tontour, whom they both adore. Next day Jeems calls at the Tontour home and apologizes for brawling in front of Toinette. The Tontours go to Quebec. Four years pass. War between Britain and France flares.

CHAPTER IV—Continued

This recalled an important matter to his mind. Toinette had entrusted him with a letter for Jeems. Boiling over with his own selfish exultations, he had forgotten it. He hoped it was an invitation for Jeems to come to the seigneurie. He had often told his girl she should be more friendly with the lad.

Jeems took the letter and went off by himself. It was the first recognition from Toinette since the day of the leaves. He had not seen her and had tried not to think of her. Alone, he read the words she had written him.

With pitiless coldness and brevity, they called him a renegade and a coward.

On a September morning some days later, Jeems stood watching his uncle as he disappeared into the frost-tinted woods of Forbidden valley. It seemed to him that Hespibah's suspicions and guardianship of the valley had become greater with the growing news of French triumphs in the south which so positively assured their safety. Only yesterday Tontour had brought the latest word from Diekau. The German had been on the eve of smashing Sir William Johnson and his mob of Colonials and Indians when his messenger had left. By this time the event had probably happened, Jeems thought. Yet his uncle was going into Forbidden valley with a look in his face which puzzled him.

Restlessness possessed Odd after Hespibah had gone. Passing years were beginning to leave their mark on the dog. He was growing content to watch life with Jeems instead of ceaselessly pursuing it. He was not old, and yet he was no longer young. There remained one thing which did not fail to stir in him the tense fierceness of his youth. It was the Indian smell. He always told Jeems when one of their wilderness visitors was near, sometimes many minutes before the savage appeared from the woods. And he never tired of watching Forbidden valley. In the dawn he faced it. At midday he dined with his half-closed eyes turned toward it. In the evening he sniffed its scents. Yet he did not go down into the valley unless Jeems or Henri was with him.

During the morning, Odd's uneasiness began to reflect itself in Jeems. Soon after noon, he left his work and told his mother he was going in the direction of Lussan's place. Catherine walked with him through the young orchard and up the slope. Never had she seemed more beautiful to Jeems. His father was right—this mother of his would always be a girl. From above the orchard, standing on a little plateau that overlooked the Bulain area, they called to Henri, who was in his turn of field, and waved at him. Jeems stood for a few moments with his arm about his mother. Then he kissed her, and Catherine watched him until he was lost to her sight in the Big forest.

Jeems did not have the desire to hunt, nor did Odd. Unexplainable impulses were pulling at them both. Odd's restlessness was unlike his master's. Whenever Jeems paused, the dog turned and sniffed the air of their trail, facing Forbidden valley in an attitude of suspicion and doubt. Jeems observed his companion's enigmatic actions. Odd was not giving the Indian signal. It was as if something without form or substance, a thing bewildering and unintelligible, lay behind them.

They came to Lussan's, nine miles from their home. Since Lussan's departure, the place had been abandoned, and in those five years the wilderness had largely reclaimed what man had taken from it. Jeems stood where he had fought Paul Tache, and ghostly whispers crept about him in the stillness. Then came a feeling of dread, almost of fear. He turned back to the house and to the open, where long ago he had stood with Toinette and all her loveliness so near to him.

The sun had set and dusk was gathering over the land before he drew himself away from the ghosts which haunted Lussan's place. Night could add nothing more to his gloom.

Odd whined frequently in his eagerness to reach home. Sometimes he showed impatience at his master's slowness by running ahead. Jeems did not hurry. He unsling his bow, which was the only weapon he had brought, and carried it ready in his hand. Yet if Odd had hinted of danger he would have paid no attention to the warning. Danger was miles away on the other side of Diekau and his men. It would come no nearer and he would never have a chance to meet it. In Toinette's eyes he would always remain a renegade and a coward.

Night thickened. The stars came out. Deepening shadows lay about them as they climbed the tallest of the hills, from which they could look over the ridges and woods between them and Forbidden valley. Because from this hill it was possible to see over the Big forest which sheltered their farm from the north winds, Jeems and his father called it Home mountain.

Odd whined as he climbed it tonight. He went ahead of Jeems, and when he gained the crest his whining changed to a howl, so low that one would scarcely have heard it at the foot of the hill.

Jeems came to him and stopped. For a space there was no beating of a heart in his breast—nothing but a stillness that was like death, a shock that was like death, a horror that could come only at the sight and the feeling of death.

Rising from the far side of the forest into which Hespibah had gone that morning was a distant glow of fire. Nearer, over the rim of Forbidden valley, the sky was a red illumination of flame. And this illumination was not of a burning forest. It was not a conflagration of dry swamp grass reflecting itself against a moonless heaven. It was a tower of blazing light, mushrooming as it rose, flattening itself in a sinister scarlet radiance under the clouds, dripping at its edges into colors of silver and gold and blood.

His home was burning! With the cry that came from his lips, there leapt madly into his mind the words that Hespibah had spoken to him a last time that morning: "If ever I'm off there and you see a fire lighting up the sky by night, or smoke darkening it by day, hurry to the seigneurie with your father and mother as fast as you can go, for it will mean my hand has set the heavens talking to you and that the peril of death is near."

CHAPTER V

For a space Jeems could not move as he gazed at the crimson sky. His home was in flames. This alone would not have daunted him with horror. His father was there to care for his mother, a new home could be built, the world did not end because a house burned. But there were two fires—and the other, farther on, reflecting itself dimly and yet more somberly, was the one that terrified him. It was Hespibah's fire talking to him through the night!

Then the choking thing in him gave way, and as the power to act returned, he saw Odd facing the lighted heavens—and in every muscle and line of the dog's rigid frame the Indian sign was clearly written.

He set off at a run down hill, and as he ran bushes whipped at his face and shadows gathered under his feet and long arms of gloom reached out from among the trees to hold him back. He could not come up with Odd. Like two shadows in a playful night, one closely pursuing the other, they ran until Jeems' breath began to break from his lips in gasps, and at the end of a mile he fell back to a walk. Odd lessened his pace to his master's. They climbed a lower hill, and once more Jeems could see the glow of fire. In the upper vault of the sky it was fading to a ghostly pallor against the sweeping arc of the Milky Way.

They ran on, and the spirit of hope began to fight for a place in Jeems' brain. This ray of light gave life and force to the arguments with which he now made an effort to hold back the grimmer thing. His home was burning. But it must be an accident, nothing that should fill him with fright. The other fire—off in Forbidden valley—was no more than a coincidence, probably a conflagration started by a careless Indian or a white man's pipe.

He paused again to get his breath, and Odd stopped with him. His shaggy body was trembling with the pent-up emotions of suspense and passion which possessed him when he caught in the air the deadly poison to his nostrils—the Indian smell. Jeems struggled not to believe the evidence which he saw, and told himself that if by any chance there were Indians at his home they were friends helping to save what they could from the tragedy of the fire.

Out of the silence Jeems heard a sound which rose above the pounding of his heart. It was so far away, so indistinct, that the stirring of the leaves had kept it from his ears. But Jeems had heard.

He had heard the firing of guns.

Over the hills and forests the sound had come to him from the direction of the Tontour seigneurie. He did not wait for the oaks to droop again. Odd led him in their last heart-breaking race into the Big forest. Leaden weights seemed to be dragging at his feet before they were through it. He had run too hard. He stopped and sagged against a tree, with Odd growling in a low and terrible way close to his knees. He was not trying to prove or disprove matters now. A catastrophe had happened to his thoughts with the firing of the guns. Taking the place of hope, even of his fears, was the one great desire to reach his father and mother as quickly as he could.

His exertions had beaten him when they came to the edge of the forest and he could have run no farther without falling. Before them was the slope, a silver carpet of the star of light. At the foot of it was what had been his home.

That it was a red-hot mass without form or stability, a pile out of which flame rose lastly, its fierceness gone, added nothing more to his shock. He had unconsciously feared this. The barn was also a heap of blazing embers. Everything was gone. Even this fact was not the one which began to break down his reason, which he had struggled so hard to keep. It was the stillness, the lifelessness, the lack of movement and sound that appalled him at first and then closed in about him, a crushing, deadening force. The fire lit up the bottom land. He could see the big rock at the spring. The paths between the gardens. The bird houses in the nearest oaks. The mill. But he could see nothing that had been saved from the burning house. He could not see his father or his mother or Hespibah Adams.

Even Odd's heart seemed to break in these moments. A sound came from him that was like a sob. He was half crouching, no longer savage or vengeful. But Jeems took no notice. He was trying to find some force in him that could cry off his mother's name. His lips were as dry as sticks, his throat failed to respond. The silence was terrific. In it he heard the snapping of an exploding ember, like a pistol going off. He could hear no one talking, no voice calling.

Fear, the repulsion of flesh and nerves to danger, was utterly gone from him. He was impelled only by thought of his father and mother, the mystery of their silence, his desire to call out to them and to hear their voices in answer. He did not fit an arrow to his bow as he walked down through the starlight, his feet traveling a little unsteadily. What was there or was not there could not be changed by an arrow.

Unexpectedly, he came upon his father. Henri was on the ground near one of Catherine's rose bushes, as if asleep. But he was dead. He lay with his face turned to the sky. Firelight played upon him gently, now increasing, now fading, as the embers flared or died, like fitful notes in a strain of soundless music.

Electrical Treatment of Soil of Little Value

There is a great difference of opinion among agricultural scientists as to the value of electricity in the cultivation of various food crops. Many English authorities claim that grain and some garden produce is quite materially speeded up so far as growth is concerned and the quality improved, by a current of electricity passing between the ground and a network of wires suspended above the growing crops. A Finland farmer reports an increase of 80 per cent in the amount of produce and grain grown in this manner. The United States Agricultural department has been experimenting with the subject for years and the final conclusion is that no benefit or at least very little has resulted from the electrical treatment of the soil. In fact it was noticed that a slightly prolonged exposure resulted in killing the seed placed in the ground. This conclusion is agreed in by some other authorities so that the preponderance of opinion is that the electrical treatment of soil is without result—exchange.

Winter Feeding Expensive

The winter feeding of big game animals is an expensive project. The federal bureau of biological survey found that it required 825 tons of hay to take care of the elk herds at the elk refuge in Wyoming from February 8 to March 26 and it costs over $25 a ton to get hay into the refuge. Without this winter food the animals would have a hard time through the winter.

Hollywood Fears, So Great Dam Will Be Junked

Because the people of Hollywood have been under mental pressure and fear that some day they may be washed out, the costly Mulholland dam and the beautiful lake formed by it will be junked. The city engineering advisory board suggested abandonment, not on account of structural weakness, but for psychological reasons, to allay apprehension of the people living below it.

Slump Spurs Idle to Hunt for Gold

Important Strikes Are Made in Abandoned Mines.

Reno, Nev.—The business depression and the low price of silver have stimulated the gold mining industry in Nevada, with new important discoveries of high grade and shipping ore being made in scattered sections.

Many of the famous old silver camps, such as Virginia City, Tonopah, and Goldfield, have responded to the world-wide cry for gold and mine operators are shipping the yellow metal from camps formerly thought to be only silver producers.

Unemployed persons have taken to the Nevada wastelands, some with a small grubstake and visions of a strike, others merely in the hope of finding steady employment at a daily wage.

The latest strike to capture the imagination is located 68 miles from Reno, at Fireball camp in Pershing county, where ore samples assayed 557 ounces of gold and 123 ounces of silver per ton. Conservative engineers who visited the Fireball returned with glowing reports.

The greatest gold excitement of the year took place in February when two old desert men, Charley and Jim Scowles, discovered high grade ore assaying as high as $45,000 a ton, in the old Rabbit Hole district, 50 miles above Lovelock. This discovery caused a real gold rush and the camp now has grown into a permanent town.

Mining men of Tonopah are speaking in whispers of some great gold discovery which has been made in that vicinity.

In Famous Camp. High grade veins in an old abandoned mine with ore assaying into the thousands have been discovered during the last month in that famous old mining camp, Virginia City, which once poured $70,000,000 of silver into the

Ants Build Home in Telephone Box

San Diego, Calif.—Ants here are fond of using telephones. They don't use them to talk over, but rather to nest in and stop the instrument. Secretary Allan Perry of the city planning commission, wrote at not having his phone ring its customary number of times during the day, found ants had built a nest about the bell and the clapper and stopped all ringing.

Arizona Man Setting a New Record

Everett Bowman of San Carlos, Ariz., broke the world record for roping and tying a calf when he accomplished the feat in 18.56 seconds. Bowman is shown tying the last knot that bound the bleating animal. He won the Major Steadman trophy for the feat at the annual Calgary stampede.

Trio of Indian Tribes End Ancient Feud

Seminola, Okla.—A feud of several centuries' standing between the Seminole and Sac and Fox Indians has ended.

No one knows how far back it extended, but although there have been no violent outcroppings recently, the bitterness was perpetuated by ambushings of one tribe or the other years ago.

During the recent powwow here, when more than 5,000 Indians gathered, Sac and Fox chieftains bid for peace. Chilli Fish, Seminole chief, accepted the offer and the two tribes crowded around the barbecue spits and broke the bread of peace.

Odd Affliction Causes Patient to Shrink

Old Soldier Loses Ten Inches in Nine Years.

Sawtelle, Calif.—In nine years Joe Mayott, a patient at the Soldier's home here, has shrunk ten inches. He is sinking into his shoes, and his head is getting larger.

Joe was born in the Catakills, near South Cairo, N. Y., a sturdy youngster in the best of health. When war broke out in the Philippines Joe went over. When he came back he enlisted for work as a heavy-timber carpenter in Panama, where he fought numerous engagements with fever and heat.

When he came out he didn't feel well. He had recurring pains in his back and legs and he found that his hat was getting too small. Now, at fifty-four, possessed of a sense of humor, Joseph has one of the strangest afflictions known to medical science.

Physicians describe, in scientific terms, his trouble as "osteitis deformans" and more familiarly as "Paget's." Its progress, ordinarily is slow and the changes are involved in the bones. The weight-bearing bones are most frequently involved, resulting in a bowing similar to that seen in rickets, and the absorption of cartilages in joints.

In 1922 Joe was 5 feet 7 inches tall.

First Rocket Airdrome Is Opened Near Berlin

Berlin.—The world's first rocket airdrome was recently opened near Berlin. It is on a tract a mile and a half square and is equipped with laboratories and workshops. At present it is being used as an experimental station, and engineers are experimenting with a means of flight which will make possible the shooting of mail to America in six hours.

FIRST FLIGHT AT 103

Miss Mary C. Hartman of Philadelphia in the cockpit of the autogiro plane in which she made her first airplane flight. She celebrated her one hundred and third birthday by going aloft in this newest type commercial plane flown by Guy Miller.

Scotchman Lives Up to Nation's Reputation

Glasgow, Scotland.—During these days of fast changing records a municipal election expense record of $2,16 has been established. It is expected to stand as an all-time record.

Ingila Milton, contesting the park ward at the recent municipal ward election, returned his expenses to the town clerk's office. Milton stated that he published no election address and addressed no public meetings.

Neither, so far as he knows, did any of his supporters solicit votes on his behalf.

Incidentally, Milton did not get a seat in the town council. He polled 246 votes, while his opponent, Victor D. Warren, got the seat with a majority of 3,322. Warren's expense account has not been made public so far.

Russian Girls Lack Flag, So No Year-Book

Paris, France.—Plans for a year book for the 1933 graduation class of nurses at the American hospital of Paris went awry because the Russian girls could not decide about the design of the flag which was to appear over their names. None of the girls is sympathetic with the soviet regime in Russia, all of them being White Russians. But Russia had so many flags between the time of the czarist regime and the rise to power of Lenin and Trotsky that the Russian nurses didn't know which was proper. Since the Swedish girls, the American girls and the Canadian girls had their flags in the book, it was decided not to print the book unless the Russian girls could have a flag.

HE WORKED HIS WAY OUT

By FANNIE HURST

FOR forty years, Cyrus Markham had nursed a dream. It was the kind of dream that can diffuse light over an entire lifetime. That is, Cyrus Markham was one of the hordes of human beings who in youth, are caught in the tight vise of routine. He lived in a world in which he had never had time, or opportunity, to play. He had never been out of the small city in which he had been born and at the age of twenty-three, after a drab series of apprenticeships as a civil service examination and taken on the position of mail carrier, which he had held ever since. To be sure, his route had changed from time to time, but even those changes had been unremarkable. Cyrus used to comment upon the fact that in all his years in the service, his territory had been confined to within four square miles.

The dream helped the tedium. It was the kind of dream fostered in the hearts of thousands and hundreds of thousands like him, caught in the treadmill of routine. Cyrus, looking toward a day of retirement and position, wanted a chicken farm. A smallish one, probably not more than six acres, with a low white house, a kitchen garden and an outlying acreage which was to be filled with the white flutterings of thousands of leg-horns.

This dream was in his heart when he married Minnie Brown, the daughter of another postman. Minnie might be said to have literally died dreaming that same dream in the little flat they occupied over a grocery store. The night before her death, she and Cyrus had been posting through farm journals and poultry magazines. The daughter of Cyrus and Minnie, Etta, was seventeen when the death of her mother occurred. She was a practical angular sort of a girl, a clerk in the town's largest hardware store. After the death of Minnie, with whom Cyrus had been content, life in the little flat above the grocery store flowed on pretty much the same, except for the aching hiatus which death had created.

Cyrus, then about fifty-eight, weathered beaten, and rather more bent with the years than his age would seem to warrant, never swerved from the routine of his life. Etta, also long injured to routine, went on with the day-by-day schedule of clerking in the hardware store.

It was a little treadmill of a household, precisely as it had been during the life of Minnie. Day-by-day-by-day. Monotonous, repetitious, narrow. And yet, there burned, even after the death of his wife, perhaps more fiercely than ever, now that he was lonely, the dream in the heart of Cyrus. He was aging now, and the chicken farm crowded his imagination.

There remained three years between him and the time he was entitled to retirement and pension. During those three years, Etta Markham became engaged to a young clerk in the hardware store. He was a likable enough young fellow, particularly congenial to Cyrus because his work in the farm-implements department of the firm had also developed in him an ambition to return to the soil.

In the end, an arrangement was concluded between Cyrus and his prospective son-in-law. The savings of the old mail carrier, some few thousand, were pooled with the slightly larger nest egg of the young man. The day old Cyrus came into his honorable retirement, Etta and Joe Cook were married and Cyrus, his daughter and his son-in-law, moved to a chicken farm thirty-two miles out of town, which they had recently purchased.

A dream had come into realization in the life of the tired, weather-beaten old mail carrier. What subsequently happened was Etta's fault, perhaps, but there never had been anything in her make-up to help avert the deadening processes that began to take place within her after her marriage to Joe Cook.

In the first place, she was the kind of woman doomed from the beginning of her marriage to bad health; the sort of wife who goes around the house with bearing-down pains. Her children came rapidly, each one seeming to leave her health more impaired than before. A certain temperamental nervousness, which had made her an incoherent child, became enhanced as responsibilities crowded upon her. As a wife, as a mother, as a daughter, poor Etta was not ideal.

Chicken farming, once you were in the midst of its complexities, its delicate mechanism, was not the simple and idyllic occupation it had seemed from the farm journals and the poultry pamphlets. Incubation was elaborate, unreliable, expensive, and usually profitless, at least as practiced by Joe Cook. The farm, mortgaged of course, started out to be a losing proposition, and as luck would have it, old Cyrus began to fail in health, but to fail in strength. It was as if, once the leather strap had lifted from his shoulders, and the burden of his mail-bag had disappeared, a certain resistance in the old man had fallen away. As Etta used to complain, a little bitterly to him when she was tired, and her nerves frayed, he was more of a hindrance than a help.

For instance, one night his son-in-law had entrusted him with a simple chore of watching certain of the heat-chore in the incubators, and poor Cyrus, sitting basking in the roar garden, had forgotten. Result: hundreds of small chickens had died and losses had crowded in further upon the household.

Life on the chicken farm was far from what Cyrus had visualized. A woman with a chronic backache; a woman constantly irritable with her babies, was not conducive to household happiness. Poor Joe, ridden from the first with fear of debt, worry about his chickens and acreage, succumbed quickly to the role of hen-cumbed husband. He was too harassed, too, and with him old Cyrus succumbed, too. They were a put upon pair, Etta scolding, nagging, yapping, at the heels of the two men.

Joe, while secretly despising the inefficiency of his father-in-law, was at least silent about it. He ceased finally to expect much in the way of help from the putty old man, whose hand trembled and whose ideas, to the younger man, seemed awkward and even senile.

As Etta's babies grew older, Cyrus gradually began to take on the role of nurse girl, sitting about with them in the garden, putting with them over mud pies, or spinning out stories that were not always coherent.

Then one day, something quite horrible happened, but fortunately did not end in tragedy. Cyrus, who had been hidden by Etta to mind the children, inadvertently permitted the second and little boy, Johnnie, aged three, to slip between the picket gate and out onto the open road, where he was run down by a motor car. Miraculously, the little fellow suffered nothing more than a broken arm and lacerations, but it was the last straw. Etta, hysterical, bearing, losing all control of herself, screamed out her rage against her father. Even Joe, shaken by the horror of what had almost happened, regarded his father-in-law in a bitter kind of silence.

After that, the old gentleman was frankly relegated to the side lines in the running of that farm and household. Nothing was expected of him. He was permitted, so long as he did not interfere in the management, to putter about at will, but no chores were entrusted to him, not even the dandling across his knees of his youngest grandchild. The routine of the chicken farm went on all about him, busy, none too successful, but relentless, none the less. The routine of the household cluttered up with the harangues and nervous shoutings of Etta moved about him, but his grandchildren lived in a world outside his pale. If he so much as touched one of them, Etta leaped to grasp the youngster away. In a frenzy of nervous fear of what accident might befall. The dream had turned into a lusterless reality.

One day, old Cyrus plodded down the road and was gone the greater part of the afternoon, returning just in time for his evening meal. It was a little out of general procedure, but neither Etta nor Joe questioned it. Let the old man work it out his own way, was their unspoken attitude. The old gentleman had worked it out his own way. He had gone down the road and appeared at a dairy farm for the position of local delivery boy; a role which had hitherto been filled by a twelve-year-old youngster. It meant trundling a small wooden wagon, filled with milk bottles, along a few miles of country road for local delivery.

The old man eagerly took on this underpaid position. He began to expand a bit under the daily routine. It reminded him of the good old days when he had been a mail carrier.

Comparatively Few Men of Wealth Big Givers

Much has been written recently about the multitude of big benevolent foundations and institutions and the good they do to the entire world. These foundations have been used as exhibit No. 1 to disprove "that Americans are selfish isolationists, interested only in accumulating wealth for themselves."

Again and again the dozen extraordinary benevolent individuals which we have produced during the last fifty years have been cited as representative of American generosity. Too easily is it forgotten that during the same period we have produced thousands of millionaires and hundreds of multi-millionaires, most of them conspicuous by their absence from the ranks of givers.

During a period of more than a century we have developed some 136 charitable trusts, but in 1928 alone there were more than 500 individuals in the United States who had yearly incomes of $1,000,000 or more. The total incomes of these persons amounted to $1,108,928,000.

The benevolences of a dozen individuals, such as Carnegie, the Rockefellers, Harkness, Rosenwald and a few others account for a considerable proportion of the existing foundations. Of the estimated $1,000,000,000 now available in these funds, the gifts of the Rockefellers and Andrew Carnegie alone make up three-fourths of the total—Abraham Epstein, in the American Mercury.

Emblem of Freedom
The Liberty cap is traced to the Phrygian cap of ancient Greece and Rome which was worn by galley slaves when they obtained their freedom.

Lesson for September 6

TURNING TO THE GENTILES

LESSON TEXT—Acts 13:13-52.
GOLDEN TEXT—For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Paul Preaching in Antioch.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Paul Preaching in Antioch.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Opening a New Field.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—A Light Unto the Gentiles.

1. Paul's Journey from Perga to Antioch (13:13-15).

From this time forward Paul, who hitherto was called Saul, takes the lead. His companions were Barnabas and John Mark. Leaving Cyprus they sailed northward to Perga, the seaport of Pamphylia.

1. Defection of John Mark (v. 13). From Perga, Mark for some reason went back. He later redeemed himself, and was ready to go again when the second missionary journey was begun, but Paul would not give credence to him (Acts 15: 38, 39). It is pleasing to note that before Paul's death he testified in Mark's favor (II Tim. 4:11).

2. In the synagogue at Antioch (v. 14, 15). From Perga, Paul and Barnabas went to Antioch in Pisidia, where they entered the synagogue on the Sabbath day. Though Paul was the apostle to the Gentiles, his order of ministry was to begin with the Jews.

11. Paul Preaching in the Synagogue (vv. 16-41).

After the usual reading of the Scriptures, in response to the invitation of the rulers, Paul delivered his first recorded sermon. In its analysis we find four parts:

1. Historical (vv. 17-23). In this section we see how Paul in a conciliatory way led them gradually through a series of changes in which God had dealt graciously with them, finally giving them Jesus, his Son. He indicated these steps as follows: (a) God chose the fathers and exalted the people (v. 17). (b) He delivered them from Egyptian bondage and led them through the terrible wilderness (vv. 17, 18). (c) He destroyed seven nations in the Land of Canaan and gave to Israel their lands (v. 19). (d) He gave them judges as deliverers when distressed by surrounding nations (v. 20). (e) After they had selfishly chosen a king, God rejected the dynasty of Saul and chose David, a man after his own heart (vv. 21, 22). (f) Finally it was God who from David's seed raised up unto Israel a Savior, Jesus.

This demanded proof which follows: 2. Apologetic (vv. 24-27). That this Jesus was of the seed of David and therefore the promised Messiah he proves by three lines of argument: (a) The testimony of John the Baptist (vv. 24, 25). (b) The prophecies of Scripture fulfilled in their rejection and crucifixion of Jesus (vv. 26-29). (c) His resurrection from the dead (vv. 30-37). Several passages of Scripture were cited as being fulfilled in the resurrection by means of which he was declared to be the Son of God with power. Having proved Jesus to be the seed of David, he proceeded to set down the doctrinal teachings growing out of it.

3. Doctrinal (vv. 38, 39). The great doctrine derived from this proof is justification by faith—the very marrow of the gospel. Observe: a. The ground of justification is the finished work of Jesus Christ. He took our place as a sinner that we might become sons (II Cor. 5:21). b. Who are justified? Those who believe in him. c. From what is one justified? All sins. The one who believes in Jesus is freely forgiven all sins. 4. Practical (vv. 40, 41). The application of this sermon was a warning lest the judgment spoken of by Habakkuk should fall upon them.

(11) The Effect of the Sermon (vv. 42-52).

1. Many of the Jews and proselytes requested to hear these words again (vv. 42-49). Almost the whole city came to hear the Word of God the next Sabbath. This great crowd incited the jealousy of the Jews.

2. Open opposition (vv. 50, 51). The persecution became so violent that Paul and Barnabas were expelled from the city. This persecution was answered by Paul's rejection of them and his turning to the Gentiles.

3. The disciples filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost (v. 52). In spite of the bitter experiences occasioned by this opposition, they were filled with joy.

Through Gates of Forgiveness
Through the gates of forgiveness we enter a new world, out from darkness into light, out from coldness into warmth, out from evil into good, out from indifference into love, out from the illusion into the real.—Richard Whitwell.

God's Dews and Showers
God's sweet dews and showers of grace slide off the mountain of pride, and fall on the low valleys of humble hearts, and make them pleasant and fertile.—Leighton.

Picturesque Apron-and-Cuff Sets

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

WHEN the modern business woman with a family comes home at night and must turn immediately to the preparation of dinner, or when the Sunday night hostess must serve light refreshments without changing to kitchen attire, her first thought is of an apron that will protect her pretty frock.

To be sure, the apron itself is all right in its way, but it does not protect the sleeves and so, as always, necessity becomes the "mother of invention" in that some clever brain has devised apron "sets" which include deep matching cuffs which are worn as you see in the picture.

It is not only the novelty and practicality of the cuffs as illustrated which attract, but the aprons themselves are very new and unusual. If there is one thing more than another which makes appeal to the home-sewing woman it is a new apron pattern. They are very easy to make, the aprons pictured, if you use a bias trim for bindings and decoration.

Make them of any suitable material. Organdy or dotted swiss is suggested for the more dressy affairs that are to cover the Sunday night frock and its sleeves with gingham, percale or gay cretonne for every day use. The bias trim comes in the proper width, cut on a true bias, ready to apply, and in boldest colors.

Quite a new idea is the surprise front effect which fashions the apron to the left. Then, too, the skirt of this apron is sewed onto a V-shape waistline which is slenderizing. For this model the designer chooses a dainty flowered percale. In this instance the bias trim is used for binding only. For the other apron which, by the way, is made of gingham the bias trim also forms decorative bands at the front and on the cuffs. Note that circular-cut side sections are seamed into the skirt portion, achieving a graceful flare for its hemline.

Where sheer material such as organdy is employed, use sheer fabric thread in matching color to stitch down the bias bands. This fabric thread does not go by number—al though in reality it is equal to a number one hundred ordinary cotton. It requires the machine gauge set to about twenty-five stitches to the inch. It is excellent for seaming frocks of sheer material as the fine stitches and the fine needle prevents the seams from fraying. Paris couturiers are using it on silks and velvets (it has an exquisite luster). In fact the use of needles and little stitches is one of the sewing secrets learned from French dressmakers.

Autumn Hats Worn High on the Head
You will find that the new autumn hats are not easy to wear and that the hair must be beautifully done, as much of the head is exposed at one side. Tiny tilted brims, very shallow crowns, the hats worn high on the head, that is the style message of the very best milliners. And managers and buyers for the hat departments in the very smartest of specialty shops assure us that these hats will be the thing next autumn and that real millinery is back with us again. And that is something for which the really well-dressed woman will be profoundly grateful.

All too long we have been content with just a covering for our heads, and the covering was not too good-looking either. Nor were the tight little caps at all healthy for the scalp, as you have no doubt learned from your favorite hairdresser.

Little Things of Dress Which Count for Chic
Your new wide, soft-and-crushable patent leather belt, how are you wearing it? Not with the buckle at the front if you are fashionable, but fastened at the back—tres chic!

In selecting hosiery for midseason wear keep in mind the stockings of lace open mesh is latest fashion decree. Give distinction to your white sports frock or jacket suit by wearing belt and scarf in vivid tri-colors. Red, white and blue or green, orange and red or "may it" in pastel such as pale pink and light blue.

As to waistlines—"going up" is the message. It seems that the new French millinery is inspiring decided changes in costume trends, as, for instance, the now-so-modish Empress Eugenie hats are influencing the raising of the waistline in empire fashion. Advance in early Paris displays reflect the styles of the 1890s to 1900s. Which is to say that the world of fashion is about to witness a revival of whims and follies of the old-fashioned sort such as ruchings, frills, longer skirts, peplums, little caps and tiny fur scarfs (maybe we will be using that quaint word "tipper" again) and ostrich boas too are in prospect, to match the trims on the new hats.

Fabric Hats
Be sure to include several of the new knockabout hats in the summer wardrobe—one version is the flannel hat of the vagabond type with a soft crown and stitched brim. It comes in every color for town or country.

Scraps of Humor

SELF-SERVICE

The telegraph pole gang had come into the restaurant straight off the job, and they were hungry. "What'll you have?" asked the lady in waiting to one of the gang's biggest and toughest.

"Beer," "How do you want it?" she persisted.

Joe waved an enormous and impatient hand. "Oh, drive in the steer and I'll bite off what I want."

NARROW FLAT

Betty—He's very narrow.

Bess—What do you expect of a flat?

Meaning Just What?
She had just accepted him, and they were discussing the "might-have-beens."

"Darling," he inquired, "why didn't you accept that little donkey Smith-er?"

"Because," she answered, dreamily, "I loved another."

The Old Sneak
Dorothy, aged five, had her photograph taken recently and when the proof was sent home her mother said she looked too solemn and asked why she didn't smile.

"I did smile, mamma," replied Dorothy, "but the man forgot to put it down."

Making Sure
She—Tell me, George, do you love me?
He—Of course I do. Didn't I tell you so five minutes ago?
She—Yes, George, but, then, men are so changeable, you know—Brooklyn Eagle.

THOSE INVESTIGATIONS

"So? Didn't know he'd been investigated."

Meeting the Inevitable
Paul—Give me a kiss or I'll sock you over the head and take one away.
Pauline—Oh, I'll not give you a kiss, and don't you dare hit me too hard!

Good for Daddy
"Well, Joan, you have a baby brother!"
"Oh, doctor, I'm so glad! Daddy was getting so girlish with just mother and me about."

Education by Example
"Do you think the modern theater is educational in its influence?"
"It is," replied Mr. Stormington Barnes, "for anybody who happens to be taking dancing lessons."

Fifty-Fifty
"I bet my head that I am right," declared Thomson.
"I bet my pocketbook that I am right," retorted Johnson, just as sure. "But your pocketbook is empty."

Obedient
"Sh-sh, dear, you mustn't clap your hands in church, even if you do like the solo."
"All right, mother, I'll just clap my hands under my breath."

How He "Lube" It
Easter, on the first ocean voyage, was feeling the pangs of seasickness. "You are a land lubber for shore," "Right, boys," said Easter, weakly. "And I'm finding out how much I really lube it!"—London Humorist.

Actually the Limit
"Jones' wife thinks the world of her husband."
"Does she?"
"Yes; she even believes the parrot taught him to swear."

President Of The Indiana State Fair

C. Y. Foster of Carmel, Indiana, President of the Indiana Board of Agriculture, which manages the Indiana State Fair, states that he believes that the visitors will have the opportunity of seeing the greatest exhibits at the State Fair that they have ever seen. The Fair this year will be held September 5 to 12. He has the following to say:

"I have been interested in the Indiana State Fair for several years and each year the Board has offered many more dollars to the public in prize money than any other fair and also has built them wonderful buildings in which to exhibit. This offers men, women and children in the State of Indiana, a great opportunity to exhibit their livestock, agriculture, sewing, etc. and gives others an opportunity to see their fine work and the fine livestock that is being exhibited."

"We also have this year, a wonderful new grandstand which was badly needed and I think the public throughout the State of Indiana appreciates that we have built it as well as the Board Members, themselves. It is built of cement and steel and the people can sit in it and enjoy the fine programs. Every person should take their vacation this week and attend this wonderful fair at least one or two days."

MARKET THE WELL FATTENED HEIFERS AT LIGHT WEIGHTS

(By Dr. John M. Evvard)

One of the most serious mistakes made in the feeding of heifer calves is to over fatten them before selling. It is very easy to carry heifers too long in the feeding lots, this both from the degree of fattening and the marketable weight stand points. Such mistakes are most costly to the feeder.

Fat heifer calves sell for the most money per hundred pounds when they are in the light weight class, tipping the scale beam at from 600 to 750 pounds per head. When 350 pound heifer calves are liberally fed on an adequate ration, they, if rightly bred, will gain under good management at least 2 pounds per head daily. In five months that means a minimum gain of at least 300 pounds, maybe 350 pounds. The 350 pound feeding heifer will then weigh from 650 to 700 pounds. At this time, if well fattened for age and size, they are near market-toppers. To carry them much longer is "poor business" ordinarily.

When the heifer calves are continued in the feeding yards for approximately nine months, the daily gain being kept close around 2 pounds a day, they will weigh from about 900 to 950 pounds, over-weight and over-fat. At this very fat, heavy weight stage, considerable increase in the cost of production per cwt. and a marked reduction in selling price is experienced.

Larger profits per head are therefore nearly always made on the 600 to 750 pound fat heifers rather than on the 850 to 950 pound kind.

Witness, My name, this 1st day of September, 1931.

what a ball game.

It certainly is worth the price . . . .

Oh boy!—two runs—two homers apiece—and the ninth inning. • The thrills of such a game are well worth the price to a ball fan—and he feels pretty well satisfied with the old home team when it crashes through. • When you compare the cost of the three hours spent in enjoying a ball game, with the cost of three hours use of electricity, you know electricity is cheap. • Look at the home runs for your money pictured below.

... but where do you get more for your money than in buying Electric Service?

NUMBER 36

HOLLIS WISE HAS HOWARD STROH ARRESTED

Howard E. Stroh of 509 South Harrison street, Garrett, furnished bond of $200 Tuesday morning to insure his appearance in the DeKalb circuit court to answer a charge of assault and battery.

It is reported that Stroh slashed Hollis Wise of St. Joe a few days ago with a pocket knife during an altercation at St. Joe, the cuts being on Wise's chest and leg.

The affidavit, prepared by Prosecuting Attorney Richard W. Sharpless, was signed by Wise. The defendant's bond was furnished by Allen Feagler of Auburn.

ASKS ELECTION BOARDS SERVE WITHOUT SALARY

A proposal that all election officials and workers donate their services at the 1932 election as a means of saving nearly $1,000,000 in taxes, was made by the Indiana Farm Bureau, Inc., Monday. The suggestion was sent by the tax and legislative department of the farmers' organization to all county presidents, county social and educational directors and county tax committee chairmen.

This will show whether we love the party or the mazzima that has always been forthcoming. Think it wise to choose those who have frequented the election board in the past for this job next election.

ANTI-AMOS 'N' ANDY

The Pittsburgh Courier, negro weekly claims to have secured one-third of its goal of 1,000,000 names to a petition asking the Federal Radio Commission to ban Amos 'n' Andy. Three basic reasons are given:

1. Exploitation of negroes for white commercial gain.
2. Portrayal of characters detrimental to the self-respect and general advancement of the race.
3. Placing business activities among negroes in a harmful light. The commission has received a resolution from a St. Louis colored lodge characterizing the Peapodent feature as "purely a caricature of the weakness and most undesirable expressions of negro character." On the other hand, Correll and Goaden—no won their third year in portraying radio's best known characters—were invited to attend a picnic sponsored by the Chicago Defender, rival of the Pittsburgh weekly. Not only that, but 15,000 bars of Amos 'n' Andy candy bars were scheduled to be distributed.

DO YOU KNOW THAT THE BEE

Is not a native to America. Is often afflicted with paralysis. Only queens and workers sting. The workers are aches. Workers are provided with vest and pants "pockets." Workers seldom produce eggs, but when they do only drones are hatched.

Drones are ultimately stung to death by the workers. When a bee stings a human it usually loses its stinger and dies, but when it stings another insect it can, as a rule, withdraw its stinger, thereby doing no harm to itself.

A bee's stinger can penetrate 1-12th of an inch.

THE NAME APPROPRIATE

DUNDEE & DUNNER collect bad debts at DUNMOW, England. In Salt Lake City, S. C. SLAUGHTER runs a meat shop and A. A. MOVING is in the moving business. Mr. FLATT owns a tire store at Logansport, Ind. SHORTLIFE and DYLONG (not partners) are undertakers at Amsterdam, N. Y. Jack VILDERUP does that at a Detroit filling station. Sam HELLFORD drives one of those fivers to deliver angel food cakes in Chicago. G. R. TUBB sells soaps, perfumes, etc., from house to house at BATH, Me. And Will R. WOOD runs a cabinet works at Evansville, Ind.

BACK TO SCHOOL

College doors are opening and young people are wending their steps back to the classrooms. Many farm boys and girls are about to begin their first year at institutions of higher learning. Some of them know why they are going to college, others do not. Some go because it is the popular thing to do; some because their parents wish them to have an education, with that hope that they may get a white collar job, and some because they want to get a training that will better fit them for a life of service.

One often wonders whether a college education pays. Surveys and investigations have been made that show that it does pay, if taken seriously; that the man who obtains a college training has a greater earning capacity than the man who has not had such a training. One such survey made at 19 leading agricultural colleges shows that the graduates have gone into many lines of activity, many of them specializing at work that pays wages or salaries much above the average. This survey also answers the question of whether agricultural college graduates go back to the farm or whether they are lost to agriculture. It was found that 5.8 per cent are doing research work; 24 per cent are teaching; 8.4 per cent are affiliated with businesses related to agriculture; 23.6 per cent are in miscellaneous activities and 27.8 per cent have gone back to the farm.

Education and training are essential to enable young men and women to successfully meet the keen competition of modern times, no matter what avenue of business they enter.

THE BROADWAY EXPRESS

ESTABLISHES LOCAL EXPRESS AGENCY HERE

Mr. L. E. Belter, Detroit, routing agent for the Railway Express Agency, was in St. Joe last week, and completed arrangements for the establishing of an express agency for St. Joe, to be handled over the Wabash.

Chas. Cochran will open the agency in the I. O. O. F. room, occupied by the Hanna Motor Sales, and thus afford a very convenient office for the public desiring the use of express.

The establishing of this office will indeed bring to St. Joe and community a convenience that has proven a necessity and one that the B. & O. has deprived the people of for months. All express billed for St. Joe was dispatched through Hicksville, causing considerable unnecessary expense and trouble to the users of express.

It's all different now.

TRY AND STOP 'EM

A group of American Legionnaires were cutting capers during their last national convention.

"They will do some damage," remarked an elderly lady to a policeman. "Can't you stop them?" "Lady," remarked the cop, "five million Germans and a whole lot of foreigners tried that once. Far be it from me to butt in."

A PLACE OF WORSHIP

Many a young man walks toward his place of worship on Sunday evening with the sincere hope that the old man will not be there when he calls.

Mrs. George Walter will be hostess to the M. P. Ladies Aid Thursday afternoon at her home north of town.

Mr. and Mrs. Lee Smith of Portsmouth, Ohio and Mrs. Arthur Flynn, visited last week in the home of Mrs. Hattie Widney.

Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Strebe of Pontiac, Mich., spent last week in the community visiting their many friends and relatives.

Rose Patee and husband of Elgin and Mrs. Maggie Knott of Batavia, Ill., were here last week looking up relation. They called on the Jackson families. Many years have passed since these people had seen each other.

The band concerts for the season closed with Saturday night's concert and a good crowd was in attendance. The season has been very successful and Donald Kinsey did his best in managing the affair for the season and leading the concerts.

Mrs. Hilda Turnbull was home from Dayton Saturday to get her children and goods. She has rented an apartment with a young couple. Since she left St. Joe for Dayton about a month ago, her mother, Mrs. Roy Koch has been taking care of the children.

Charles and Geraldine Thornton of Washington, D. C., are here spending a week with friends before entering the school term. They are fine, but Charles seems to think he enjoys St. Joe better than Washington and that's because he doesn't have the freedom that he enjoys here.

Walter Coburn will enter Butler University the week of Sept. 21, and start on the two year course of study in order to receive his B. D. degree. When he finds suitable living quarters he will take his family with him. At present they are all at the W. P. Coburn home, near Coburntown.

Wm. Wadsworth, wife and son of Garrison, Ky., spent a few days the past week with LeRoy Mann and wife. Mr. Wadsworth and LeRoy are brothers. Curtis Hursey, O. E. Inlow and family and the Manns spent Sunday in the Jay Hart home. Roy Moore and wife, Mrs. Alice Moore and Edward Zirkle of Hartford City were also guests, and with Mrs. Ada Mann, spent Monday in the Curt Hursey home.

Mr. and Mrs. Guy Buckingham and family of Bucyrus, O., visited their parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Buckingham from Saturday until Monday evening. Among the interesting places they were shown while here was Limberlost Cabin, Rome City. While there the ladies were handed a most beautiful bouquet of old fashioned flowers picked from the perennial plot planted by Mrs. Porter, which made the bouquet one to be treasured and more fully appreciated, as being the choice of the Hoosier favorite.

GALILEAN SERVICE ON RIVER BANK

Sunday evening, September 20, at 5:30 at the Dills River bridge, mid-way between St. Joe and Spencerville.

Every Church and Sunday School in the community has been invited to participate in the program with a special number. This will be a great river bank service, as depicted in the bible, when Jesus addressed the great throng, from the boat.

The program will feature the singing of "Shall We Gather at the River," Prayer; Boys quartet from Hicksville, O.; the address by Rev. Elza, of Bluffton and the special numbers by the churches. At the close a beautiful candle light service will be held, closing with the singing of "Send the Light."

The public is invited.
Homer Studabaker, Chair.

GEE REUNION

Sunday, September 6th was the scene of a reunion of the Mr. and Mrs. Harmon Gee descendants at the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Curie, in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Gee and family of Conneaut, O. A bountiful basket dinner was served at the noon hour to thirty-nine.

Those present were: Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Gee and family of Conneaut, O., Mr. and Mrs. Laney Gee, Mr. and Mrs. Foster Gee and family and Mrs. S. D. Gee of St. Joe, Howard Gee and daughters of Fort Wayne, Mr. and Mrs. I. S. Hadsell of Hicksville, Mr. and Mrs. Milo Provine and family of Butler, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Gee and family and Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Neiland (the latter newly weds) of Auburn. Mr. and Mrs. Forrest Fusselman and daughter of Newville were afternoon guests. All were treated in the afternoon to melons by the Curies.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Hough and son of Columbus, O., were Sunday and Monday guests of Mrs. Inez Hadsell. Paul Hadsell and family of Portland and Ray Gustin and wife of Farmer, O., were Sunday visitors.

Four hundred and one Purdue University students reached places on the "Distinguished List" or honor roll for the second semester of the past academic year. It was revealed today with announcement of the list by President E. C. Elliott. This is the largest number in the history of the University. Placing on the honor roll not only gives a student scholastic distinction, but certain fees are refunded, amounting to $25 per semester. The distinguished list included 118 freshmen; 81 sophomores; 104 juniors; 90 seniors. Those from DeKalb county on the list are as follows: Frank Miser of Garrett, Edward R. ### CARE OF THE TEETH

Less than a hundred years ago the tooth brush was practically unknown as well as dentifrices; now one hears of a new dentifrice every few months; however, those who lived in the early days without any of these (now considered necessities) had teeth that were much better than we possess today. By ordinary reasoning one would say that these things injure the teeth, but we must go back of that to find the trouble. Our grandmothers and great grandmothers ate food that was coarse and rough, which scoured the teeth and gums and at the same time supplying the necessary minerals and vitamins to keep the teeth and gums healthy.

Teeth and gums need to work to keep healthy just as does every other part of the body. Food that slips down easily is not well masticated, gives the teeth no work at grinding, which they are made to do. Foods that require a great deal of chewing are needed for healthy teeth. Corn bread, nuts, apples—skins and all—green, fresh vegetables, such as cabbage, lettuce, celery, green onions, all need to be well chewed; this is not all; they are rich in the elements needed for a healthy body.

Recent research has taught us that tooth decay is observed where vitamin C is lacking. Dr. Milton T. Hanke of the University of Chicago in his study of the average American diet, showed it to be deficient in this valuable vitamin C. The reason for this is that this particular vitamin is very unstable, is easily destroyed by cooking and it appears that the body cannot store up this vitamin for any length of time, so we need our new supply daily.

Roth orange and lemon juice contain liberal quantities of vitamin C, also green vegetables as well as other fruits.

My Neighbor Says:

SEASONING added to the water in which a ham is being boiled help give a delicious, savory meat. The amounts can be varied to suit the taste, but the following kinds and proportions are satisfactory for one ham: Two carrots, diced; one small onion stuck with several cloves; a stalk or two of celery, diced; one sprig of parsley, and a few pepper-corns.

If apples or tomatoes are pricked with a fork before baking they will not break open while cooking.

When you are cleaning a room make some powdered whitening into a thin paste with cold water and smear this mixture over the panes with a piece of rag. When dry lightly rub off and polish the glass with clean dusters. The window is thus cleaned easily and quickly.

Four cupfuls of flour equal one pound.

Lights of New York

By WALTER TRUMBULL

Education is not a matter of school or college. Those merely are places where facilities for education are grouped and made more available. But all anyone needs for education is ambition and perseverance. It is hard to see how anyone can avoid a certain amount of education in these days. It was not so long ago that a dweller in a rural community had to depend mainly upon his imagination to tell him what foreign lands looked like or what good music might be. He never heard the voice of a really prominent foreigner, or even of the leading thinkers of his own country. Today, the movies bring him the atmosphere of foreign lands. He is as well acquainted with the appearance of the great buildings of the world as he is with that of his own barn. He knows how the people of distant countries look, move and act. On the radio, he hears the best music, the best orators, the best comedians, the keenest thinkers. Good roads and automobiles bring newspapers and magazines to his door, and enable him to travel in a few hours to places which it would have taken his grandfather days and weeks to reach. Man's viewpoint is extended to the extent that he is obliged to absorb general knowledge, whether he has any ambition to educate himself or not. And as for New York, the city is an education in itself.

At Daruma's, the Japanese restaurant on Sixth avenue, the waiter puts a gas ring on the table, places a sauce pan on the ring, and proceeds to cook your food in it. He then gives you a pair of chopsticks and leaves you to do the best you can. There is a trick in eating with chopsticks. You place one stick in the hollow between the thumb and first finger and press the tip of the third finger firmly against it. This holds it rigid. The thumb and the first two fingers, is moveable. Once you master the technique, eating with chopsticks becomes fairly easy. But until you get good at it the safest thing is to tuck your napkin under your chin.

He has a sitting room, bed room, and bath on a court, and a misplaced sense of humor. One hot night, he decided to retire early. As he entered his bedroom, in which no light was lit, he saw through the open window food. His house, this pretty box, was covered with long, sharp spines like thorns, that made him an unpleasant fellow to handle.

His feet were perhaps the oddest parts of him, though everything about him was strange. To begin with, he had dozens of them; one coming out of each of the holes on the shell. Then they could be stretched out as long as he wished, and the legs (you may call them that) were, of course, not larger than threads. The foot itself, at the end of each thread-like leg, was round and fat; and when the box was made of several hundred plates, and covered by the thin skin of the living urchin. One work of this skin was to enlarge the house as fast as he grew, and it was done by constant adding of building material to the edges of each plate; thus each one became bigger, and yet they always fitted together; so you may say that the box grew as well as the urchin that lived in it.

Surely more wonders were never packed into one small box; and we have not told you all, either.

two girls across the court. Their window also was open; the light blazed. They were girls the man never had seen before and their conversation was plainly audible. Their idea was that it was too hot to stay in—and that somewhere there must be a man who would take them to a night club. They telephoned a couple without success. Finally, one of the girls said: "Well, tell him as soon as he comes in to call Dorothy." And she gave her number.

This was enough for the listener. He went into his living room, where he had a telephone which doesn't go through any apartment switchboard, and he called that number. He got it. "Is this Dorothy?" he said. "Well, Dorothy, it sure is good to talk to you again. I suppose you heard the old man getting your number that you don't even remember my voice. I'd never forget your voice. Oh, well, what's the use?" And he hung up the receiver and went back into the bedroom.

The Nest.
What is this, a pile of rocks?
No, it can't be that.
This next drawing's something like
A funny sort of hat.

What a terrible mistake!
It is a nest, I see;
And full of eggs—I wonder where
The little bird can be?

The Bunny.
Draw two flower petals first,
And add a center, round;
Draw a line, a sort of stem,
That reaches to the ground.
Then in front, a sprig of grass,
But, say, this drawing's funny—
Why it is not a flower at all,
It is a perky Bunny!

A House of Shell

Most of the curious things you pick up on the seashore are really wrecks—deserted houses, cast-off clothes, or outgrown cradles and restraints of some of the many strange and wonderful creatures that live in the sea.

One of the prettiest is a lovely box as white as snow, and more fragile than the thinnest china. It is covered with a pattern of tiny knobs and holes, that look like delicate carving.

and it is round in shape, flattened on top exactly like a common white turnip. These boxes are found in a number of sizes, from little to big, the size of a pen to as big as the top of a drinking glass, and in some parts of the world as big as a dinner plate.

In this elegant house lived a very strange fellow called a sea urchin. His mouth opened on the under side of his body, where the larger hole in the shell, and that point he had five big teeth, quite able to cut his the urchin wanted to walk he thrust out his feet on one side till they touched something, where they stuck, and held there, it is said, by drawing out the air under them; then he pulled himself along.

One of the most interesting things is the way the sea urchin grows. The baby sea urchin is about as big as the dot you make over a small i. You can just see it moving slowly about in the water; but with a microscope it proves to be an elegant little creature, of the oddest shape, perhaps more like a painter's easel than anything else. It is made of clear, glassy-looking rods, with rose-colored tips on some of the upper ones, and covered with little specks that reflect light, and made it very brilliant. It moves about by waving in the water fringes of delicate hairs, cilia, the books call them, and it is so very small that the waving of hairs will move it about.

How do you suppose the sea urchin's delicate shell house gets bigger? He never has but one, and when he was the size of a pin-head it was not too big for him, and when he is as large as a teacup it still fits him. Let me tell you. When the owner lived in it

HONORING THEIR COLLEGE STUDENTS

A splendid program was given Sunday morning at the Methodist Sunday School, honoring the young folks leaving for college, DuWayne Kinsey, Virginia and Dorothy Ginter.

A souvenir program was given each attendant, bearing a likeness of DuWayne Kinsey. In addition to the orchestra music a male trio sang "School Days" and Earl William Kinsey rendered a fine piano solo.

J. C. Mayfield gave a talk on the old time school, and he hued from the green timber, seats that were used in his boyhood days, and his talk was interesting from start to finish.

An old time mother, small baby and two daughters appeared during the talk, showing how people dressed in the early days. County Superintendent, Carl Stallman talked to the school on "The Modern Day School" stressing the importance of education today, over that of the early day. The service was impressive and the young folks have the best wishes of their many friends.

Develops New Ideas in Child Camp Education

A new idea in child education that enables the youngsters to put their leisure to constructive use and at the same time give mother a vacation has been evolved and put to practical application by a young woman of St. Charles, Ill., Miss Stella Marie Pike, widely known for her kindergarten and school activities.

"The progressive education idea holds that we cannot learn through absorption, only through action," said Miss

Miss Stella Marie Pike.

Pike. "We work around the child. We do not coerce the child to do our will, but get the boy and the girl to wish to do the right thing because it is the right thing. We are thus able to achieve correct habits in sleeping, eating, playing, and courtesy without undue force. We take stubborn children and in two months they are much more co-operative and willing to do the proper thing. We take noisy, impulsive children and help them to be self-controlled in action and thinking. We take the timid child and teach him to unfold, relax and express himself."

BUILDING NEW PRISONS

NOW that public opinion regarding the recent outbreaks in the prisons at Columbus, Ohio, and Auburn, N. Y., has sufficiently acquiesced to enable one to take an impartial view of prison conditions, the question pressing for decision seems to be: Is the proposed expenditure of one hundred million dollars for the construction of new prisons justified?

That conditions within prison walls are most deplorable no one will deny. Nor can any serious doubt be entertained as to the wisdom of creating better sanitary conditions, enlarging prison quarters, etc. The matter of spending so vast a sum of money for one hundred million of dollars demands more serious consideration than just present physical conditions within prison walls.

The proposed expenditure again raises the question as to the purpose for the punishment of crime. If the purpose be to demand, in the interest of justice alone, so much punishment for so much crime, the expenditure certainly does not seem justified. It is a very expensive method of obtaining "the sound of flesh." If the purpose of imprisonment is for the protection of society, the expenditure may seem justified at first thought, but is society really protected? An answer to this question asks that we take into consideration the effect upon society of the large number of criminals who are annually pardoned, or who escape prison confinement, or having served their legal sentence leave the prison more desperate characters than they were on the day they entered.

New prisons, however sanitary and comfortable, are inadequate to solve the problem of crime as college buildings are to guarantee an education. A college consists of the men upon its faculty, not in a group of buildings upon a campus. So the building of new prisons, while affording more space for a larger group of inmates, does not make any satisfactory contribution to the crime problem.

If the purpose of prison confinement be less of punishment for the violation of law and more of reformation in order to keep the law, the expenditure seems justifiable, especially if the person incarcerated leaves prison a better man morally than he was on the day he entered.

HOUSE FLY IS MAN'S MOST DEADLY ENEMY

30 DISEASES ARE SPREAD BY FLIES

Germs of Tuberculosis, Diphtheria and Smallpox Are Transported by Insects.

The common house fly is the most dangerous enemy to mankind, causing more than 75,000 deaths annually, according to Dr. O. F. Hedenburg, director of the Rex Research Foundation, Chicago, which is engaged in a nationwide warfare on "public enemy" insects.

"These deaths result directly from germs carried by the fly from its unsanitary breeding places to man and his food," said Dr. Hedenburg. "Deaths caused by flies are many times more than those caused by wars and wild beasts of all times."

"About 30 diseases are known to be spread by germs carried by flies. The most common are typhoid, infantile diarrhea, cholera, and dysentery. Census reports show that infantile diarrhea, better known as "summer complaint," germs of which are transported by the fly, causes more deaths among children than measles, scarlet fever, whooping cough and diphtheria put together."

Other common ailments traceable to flies are tuberculosis, anthrax, eye disease, diphtheria and smallpox.

Health authorities declare that the fly can be eliminated most effectively by destroying its breeding places—refuse and garbage piles, by screening windows and destroying the flies that get into the house with a good fly spray.

Research in the Foundation's laboratories has definitely proven that fly-papers, powders and swatters are inefficient as exterminators. The favored method—spraying—should be applied with a hand sprayer directed towards the walls and ceilings of the rooms. The mist drawn into their breathing pores paralyzes the flies, quickly causing their death.

SPRAYING MOST EFFECTIVE WAY TO DESTROY FLIES

SCIENCE FROWNS ON SWATTING FLY

Urges Use of Insecticide to Kill Fly as Well as the Germs He Carries.

Leading health authorities declare that a single fly can carry 6,000,000 germs and because of this serious health menace they warn that the appearances of flies in the home is a danger signal to be quickly heeded by the careful housewife.

Dr. O. F. Hedenburg, director of the Rex Research Foundation, Chicago, which is engaged in a nation-wide warfare on flies and other "public enemy" insects, states that a study of the life of flies shows that it is impossible for them to live without their bodies being continually laden with germs. "Flies hatch, grow and crawl only in the most unsanitary places," said Dr. Hedenburg. "They come direct from these places to the home."

"The only effective modern method of exterminating flies is to use a good house spray. It is very unsanitary to swat the fly because swatting merely releases the millions of germs in and on the hairy body and the insect's sticky footpads. These germs remain alive and scatter to contaminate human habitation and food. Swatting also soils walls and fabrics."

"A sprayed insecticide will instantly kill flies and the germs they carry. This spray when 'shot' to the ceiling and walls forms a mist cloud that clears the room not only of flies but other pests. It is stainless, entirely harmless when breathed by humans and animals, and has a pleasing odor."

"Extermination by spray leaves no stains or other disorder. Clean up. The dead flies are easily disposed of by sweeping or with a vacuum cleaner."

BLOOD PRINCIPAL FOOD OF MOSQUITO

Most relentless of all insects in its torture of humans is the blood-thirsty female mosquito. The male is harmless. Not only does the female sink her "dagger" deep into the flesh and leave a swollen and irritating wound to get her fill of blood, but in that wound she injects a poisonous fluid and oftentimes dangerous disease germs to cause sickness and death, according to the Rex Research Foundation.

Although to many people a mosquito is just a single humming pest that goes around under cover of darkness puncturing skins, there are many varieties of this pest. The Foundation points out. Some of these breed in old tin cans containing water and in rain barrels; others, in swamps and ponds, while still others breed in clear, cool water. And there are also mosquitoes which prefer the stagnant water of sewers. The principal food of all common mosquitoes is blood of humans, animals, birds, and even snakes.

The mouth parts of the female mosquito are admirably adapted to piercing the skin. The "dagger" is made up of a bundle of six very fine sharp needles which puncture the skin easily and through which the mosquito pumps blood into her stomach. Before the blood is drawn, however, she injects a poisonous fluid which thins the blood so that she can draw it up readily. It is this poison that causes the familiar mosquito bite.

The best cure for mosquito bites is their prevention. This is done most effectively in or about the home by destroying the mosquito before she gets a chance to land on her victim. Spraying with a good spray made expressly to kill mosquitoes and other insects is a sure way to exterminate these pests. This spray material floating in the air as a fine mist, while harmless to humans, and nonstaining to household furnishings, also keeps other mosquitoes from entering the room.

CHEMICAL SPRAY SPEEDS MAN'S WAR ON HOUSEHOLD FLY

All through the ages, since human misfortunes were first chronicled, mankind has struggled to protect itself from its chief pestilence and wartime enemy and annoyances—the common house fly which is credited nowadays with causing 75,000 deaths annually.

Paulus Silentarius, the Roman, accomplished the first really progressive step in outsmarting the fly in the Sixth century, A. D., according to O. F. Hedenburg, director of the Rex Research Foundation, Chicago, which is staging a modern nation-wide warfare on household insect pests. This wily Roman ordered a fine net built around his bed to keep the flies away so he could sleep in peace.

His method proved so good that it was used until recent years, as was the later and more widespread idea of "swatting."

"More real progress in fly extermination has been made in the last five years than in the previous five centuries through the development of scientific chemical sprays which destroy flies in homes and elsewhere wholesale without injuring humans or animals," Doctor Hedenburg said.

"This crowning achievement was accomplished at Mellon Institute in the form of liquids, which, sprayed into the air, form a mist cloud that may be breathed by people with perfect safety but which quickly and efficiently eliminates all insect pests in a room. It leaves no stain on clothing or walls."

Doctor Hedenburg declares that homes should be sprayed with a good insecticide twice daily, once, perhaps in the afternoon, to protect baby's nap, and once just before bedtime, thus destroying all germ carrying or otherwise destructive insects that may have entered through opened doors or meshes in the screens.

$858,000,000 ANNUAL U. S. LOSS FROM INSECTS

"THE FEARFUL SEVEN" HOUSEHOLD PESTS WHICH ATTACK MAN AND DAMAGE HIS PROPERTY

with poison of her own creation but inoculates the blood with malaria, yellow fever and other infectious ailments.

"The moth is the most destructive of the seven," Doctor Hedenburg declared. "The damage it does to woolens and other fabrics is dreaded by every housewife. The cockroach is most repulsive—it scatters germs wherever it crawls, and spoils food with which it comes in contact."

"Dangerous infection may result from the bedbug's bite, as it is also a germ conveyor. The flea transfers germs from rodents and vermin to human body. The ant—especially the red ant—is a robber and despoiler of foodstuffs.

"Safety from the menace of these insects can only be attained by immediate, thorough extermination at the first sign of their presence, it was declared. Doctor Hedenburg declared that a good spray is the most effective and efficient destroyer of insects, because the method exterminates wholesale and quickly."

SOME DEPRESSIONS WORSE THAN THIS

By ROME C. STEPHENSON
President American Bankers Association

ONE of the most significant aspects of the present business period is that, while we had a speculative panic and while we have had a general economic breakdown yet we have not had any semblance of a financial panic, such as occurred in 1907, and in other years when the credit and monetary machinery broke down and we had money panics, suspension of specie payments and kindred disasters.

None of these elements of a true financial panic has been present in this depression of the 1930's. At no time was the banking structure as a whole shaken, despite the unprecedented rate of small bank failures that it had to absorb. At no time was the banking and credit machinery unable to extend support to the panic-stricken and broken stock markets and cooperation to all kinds of business and manufacturing. Anyone would have been a wise prophet who could have foretold that our banking and credit structure would stand up so well under conditions so bad.

Finance Taking Cuts
And banking and corporate finance in this period of depression are unfortunately taking their portions of short rations and enforced self-denial that the nation's need for readjustment demands. Interest rates on money, yields on securities and dividends on corporate investment have all dropped to levels that constitute drastic reductions in the compensation of capital. These are but part of the necessary economic readjustments that all phases of the country's working life must go through before a general revival of business activity can start.

It is my belief—indeed it is my hope—that the tempo of the next cycle of prosperity will be somewhat more moderate than the mad whirl of jazz that brought the last one to a close. I think it will be agreed that the worst aspect of the collapse of that period of false prosperity is the condition of insecurity for employment which it caused. Unemployment is our greatest public problem today.

Unemployment is the worst wage cut that the worker can suffer. It is the worst cause of stagnation that business has to strive against. The sooner we can get our masses of workers back into jobs on almost any terms the better it will be both for capital and labor.

THE MACHINE AGE APPLIED TO CRIME

Methods Employed by Criminals Demand New Police Methods, Bankers Association Official Declares.

USE by criminals of modern technological developments such as automobiles, machine guns and airplanes have given them advantages which old-fashioned local and district police systems are powerless to combat and the situation demands the broader modern protection of State police systems, James E. Baum, deputy manager American Bankers Association in charge of its crime investigating department, declares in the protective section of the American Bankers Association Journal.

"The Association's Protective Committee has repeatedly urged the advantages of extending state police systems beyond the nine eastern States which have enjoyed this protection for many years," Mr. Baum says. "The time has passed when we can safely rely upon the discredited and often times ineffective methods of local and county police. The advent of automobiles and better roads, to say nothing of machine guns and airplanes, demands the same wide latitude in authority and field of operation be given the police no less than the criminal."

Statewide Police Plans Best
He quotes a Kansas judge as saying that "our system of sheriffs and constables was not designed to meet present-day conditions. As a system of law enforcement, it is as out of date as old common-law pleading, both evolved about the same time. The semi-military, highly trained State police officer owing allegiance only to State laws, is the most effective agency for order yet brought forth."

Holdups Fewer Under New Plan
"If we extend the comparison of the robbery experience in these States enjoying State-wide police protection to the record in eight central and far western States, we find a total of 304 bank holdups in the latter group. The odds, therefore, continue to be not less than 8 to 1 against the banks in these western States, where they are denied the speedy, coordinated action of State police and their modern means of transportation and communication. The same comparison holds true of the farmers' losses through robberies of livestock, poultry, produce, etc."

"Moreover, these State police forces invariably yield an operating profit in the amount of fine collected and the value of stolen property recovered. Bankers interested in cutting down the cost of robbery insurance might well consider this job of extending State police systems as a timely, co-operative service to be undertaken alongside the farmers."

BANK EMPLOYEES SENT TO SCHOOL

Modern Scientific Financial and Management Methods Taught Throughout Country.

THE American Institute of Banking Section of the American Bankers Association conducts 222 chapters, or local banking schools in as many cities throughout the country. One large city chapter has almost 6,000 students, who are combining formal theoretical and practical banking studies with their daily working experience and other places have these schools with a thousand to two thousand students. In addition there are fifty study groups in small communities with some 6,000 enrollments. All told over 42,000 bank people are taking these courses—not only clerks, but junior officers and even senior officers in some of the more advanced work.

The work of the institute has been declared to be "a dynamic economic force, pouring into banking a broadening, deepening stream of better qualified bankers than could be developed merely by the daily workings of banking itself," and it has been suggested that every bank worker should be compelled to combine institute courses with his work. A good many banks now make it a part of the contract of employment that an employee shall undertake to render himself proficient and trustworthy in banking by taking institute work and others make successful progress in this educational aspect of banking a pre-requisite to promotion. Plans are being developed to make the benefits of banking education through this organization more generally available in the rural districts.

CHAIN, GROUP AND BRANCH BANKING

Bankers' Commission Describes Differences Among Various Kinds of Multi-Office Banks.

THE Economic Policy Commission of the American Bankers Association has made the following statement on various types of banking systems operating through more than one office:

"We find that there are recognized in the banking world three types of multiple banking organizations, namely, chain bank systems, group bank systems and branch bank systems. They are alike solely in respect to the fact that each embraces under some form of common control or influence two or more banking places, but here the similarity stops since there are essential differences in organization and administration, especially as between branch banking and the chain and group forms."

"Chain banking is recognized as probably the least definite form of multiple banking organization. Generally speaking, this term refers to merely a string of individual separately chartered banks owned or controlled through stock holdings by one or more common individuals, sometimes without public knowledge of the common ownership. Frequently the controlled banks are not administered as a coherent whole under the guidance of a central, publicly known head office, but rather each bank is run as a separate unit bank in accord with the wishes of the dominant interest. In some cases, however, there is a central, publicly known control with a head office that formally supervises the operations of all the banks controlled, and this is perhaps the more desirable arrangement. It lacks, however, the definite legal responsibility that a corporate head organization would have. Each bank in a chain system operates under its own capital and there is ordinarily no binding relation among members of the string."

Group Responsibility
"Group banking, on the other hand, is a system in which, while the member banks are separately chartered and operate as individual units with their own capital, control is exercised through a publicly known corporate organization under the direction of a responsible head office. It openly holds stock control of the member banks and is morally and legally responsible as the chief stockholder for their administration and the statutory share of their liabilities. An essential feature of this kind is publicly known, which creates a large degree of responsiveness to public opinion. This is true because anything of an undesirable nature developing in one member of the group would create public distrust of the whole group. Therefore its sense of self-preservation as a group, if nothing else, tends to make it enforce standards of conduct throughout the members of the group and to assume responsibilities for them beyond what mere legal responsibilities would bring about."

"Branch banking is completely distinct from the two foregoing forms of multiple organization in that it does not consist of a string, chain or group of independent banks, for there is only one chartered bank in a branch organization and the extensions from it are all in the form of sub-offices without separate capital or corporate existence. For everything that is done through these offices the bank itself is just as responsible legally and in every other sense of the word as though it were done over its own counters in its head office."

Bankers Help

In a report on banker-farmer work, H. Lane Young, Chairman Agricultural Commission, American Bankers Association, shows that during the past year there were 409 meetings reported in 38 states, with a total attendance of 28,578. County key bankers numbering 2,541 were appointed in 35 states. Thirty-four states reported an expenditure by banks of $106,936 for developing better agricultural practices.

Special banker-farmer activities engaged in by banks in 27 states numbered 8,493, while 7,140 projects or farm programs were carried on by rural people through the influence of bankers.

For three years the Agricultural Commission has given special recognition to the state reporting the highest record of accomplishments and this year Georgia achieved first place with its banker-farmer agricultural program. Representatives of the Georgia State College and officials of the Georgia Bankers Association developed the methods and policies which made it possible for Georgia to carry out an effective program which emphasized "directed credit from banks for producing crops on the live-at-home basis."

Appreciation for the cooperation received from local bankers was recently expressed by County Agent R. E. Bodley of Gallatin County, Montana, who said: "My personal experience has been that the average banker will go more than half way with the county agent, providing the latter has demonstrated that his work is constructive and conservative, that he is a man capable of handling confidential information and treating it as such, and one who can 'keep his feet on the ground.'"

THE STORY

With his English wife, Catherine, and son, Jeems, Henry Bullin, French settler in Canada in 1749, cultivating a farm adjacent to the Tontout seigneurie. As the story opens the Bullins are returning from a visit to the Tontouts. Catherine's wandering brother, Hepsibah, meets them with presents for the family. To Jeems he gives a pistol, bidding him perfect himself in marksmanship. Hepsibah fears for the safety of the Bullins in their isolated position. Jeems fights with Paul Tache, cousin of Tontout, and the English, whom they both adore. Next day Jeems calls at the Tontout home and apologizes for his behavior in front of Tontout. The Tontouts go to Quebec. Four years pass. War between Britain and France flares. Jeems returns from a hunt to find his home burned and his father and mother slain.

CHAPTER V—Continued

As softly as the light, without a sob or cry, Jeems knelt beside him. He spoke his father's name, yet knew that no answer would rise from the lifeless lips. He repeated it in an unreluctant way as his hands clutched at the silent form. The starlight left nothing unrevealed; his father dead, his white lips twisted, his hands clenched at his side, the top of his head naked and bleeding from the scalping knife. Jeems slumped down. He may have spoken again. He may have sobbed. But the thing like death that was creeping over him, its darkness and vastness, hid him from himself. He remained beside his father, as motionless and as still. Odd crouched near. After a little, an inch at a time, he crept to the dead man. He mustered the hands that were growing cold. He licked Jeems' face where it had fallen against his father's shoulder. Then he was motionless again, his eyes seeking about him like balls of living flame. Death was in the air. He was breathing it. He was hearing it. At last, irresistibly impelled to answer the spirit of death, he sat back on his haunches and howled. It was not Odd's howl any more than it had been Jeems' voice speaking to his father a few moments before. It was a ghostly sound that seemed to quiet even the whispering of the leaves, an unearthly and shivering cry that sent echoes over the clearing, with grief for company.

It was this which brought Jeems out of the depths into which he had fallen. He raised his head and saw his father again, and swayed to his feet. He began seeking. Close by, near the pile of apples which she had helped him gather from under their trees on the slope, he found his mother. She, too, lay with her face to the sky. The little that was left of her unbound hair lay scattered on the earth. Her glorious beauty was gone. Starlight, caressing her gently, revealed to her boy the hideousness of her end. There, over her body, Jeems' heart broke. Odd guarded faithfully, listening to a grief that twisted at his brute-soul. Then fell a greater silence. Through long hours the burning logs settled down into flattened masses of dying embers. The darkness came which precedes the day, and after that, dawn. Jeems rose to face his blasted world. He was no longer a youth but a living thing aged by an eternity that had passed. It was Odd who led him in the quest for Hepsibah Adams. He sought like one half blind and yet sensed everything. He saw the trampled grass, a hatchet lost in the night, and on the hatchet an English name. But he did not find his uncle.

In the same gray dawn, stirring with the wings of birds and the play of squirrels among the trees, he set out for Tontout manor. He carried the hatchet, clutching it as if the wood his fingers gripped held life which might escape him. Because of this hatchet there grew in him a slow and terrible thought that had the strength of a chain. The weapon, with its short hickory handle, its worn iron blade, its battered head, might have been flesh and blood capable of receiving pain or of giving up a secret, so tenuous was the hold of his hand about it. But he did not see the iron or wood. He saw only the name which told him that the English had come with their Indians, and had sent them, as his uncle had so often said they would. The English. Not the French. The English.

And he held the hatchet as if it were an English throat. But he was not thinking that. The part of him conscious of the act was working unknown to the faculties which made him move and see. His thoughts were imprisoned within stone walls, and around these walls they beat and trampled themselves, always alike, telling him the same things, until their repetition became a drowning in his brain. His mother was dead—back there. His father was dead. Indians with English hatchets had killed them, and he must carry the word to Tontout. Thought which had been wrecked and beaten until now possessed him with a flame behind it that began to burn fiercely but which seemed to give no heat or excitement, until they were those of a savage, flinty in their hardness and without depth in which one might read his emotions. His face was white and passionless, with lines caught and etched upon it as if in bloodless stone. He looked at the hatchet again, and Odd heard the gasp which came from his lips. The hatchet was a voice telling him things and glowing in the story it had to tell. It made him think more clearly and pressed on him an urge for action. As he drew nearer to Tontout manor, the instincts of self-preservation awoke in him. They did not make him leave the open trail or travel less swiftly, but his senses became keener, and unconsciously he began to prepare himself for the physical act of vengeance.

To reach Tontout was the first obligation in the performance of this act. Tontout still had a few men who had not gone with Diekan, and as Jeems recalled the firing of guns, a picture painted itself before his eyes. The murderers of his father and mother had swung eastward from the hidden valley, and the seigneur, warned by Hepsibah's fire, had met them with loaded muskets. He had faith in Ton-tout and did not question what had happened in the bottom lands. Before this no doubt had crossed his mind as to Hepsibah's fate. The English hatchets had caught him, somewhere, or he would have come during the long night when he and Odd had watched alone with death. But now a forlorn and scarcely living hope began to rise in his breast as he came to Tontout's hill—an unreasoning thought that something might have driven his Uncle Hepsibah to the Richelieu, a hope that, after lighting his signal fire, he had hurried to the manor with the expectation of finding his people there. His father must have seen Hepsibah's warning across Forbidden valley, and had waited, disbelieving, while death traveled with the shades of night through the lowlands.

He might see Hepsibah, in a moment, coming over the hill. . . . Hepsibah, and the baron, and men with guns. . . . Even Odd seemed to be expecting this as they sped through the last oak open and climbed the chestnut ridge. Beyond were the thick edging of crimson sumac, a path breaking through it, and the knob of the hill where they had always planned to gaze over the woodland which had been given by the king of France to the stalwart vassal Tontout.

Jeems emerged at this point, and the spark which had grown in his breast was engulged by sudden blackness. There was no longer a Tontout manor. There were no buildings but one. The great manor house was gone. The looped porch was gone. The farmers' cottages beyond the meadows and fields were gone. All that remained was the stone gristmill, with the big wind wheel turning slowly at the top of it and making a whining sound that came to him faintly through the distance.

Jeems, looking down, saw in the drifting veil of smoke a shroud that covered death. For the first time he forgot his father and mother. He thought of some one he had known and loved a long time ago. Tontout. As he had stood at the edge of the Big forest seeking for a figure that might have been his mother's, he now quailed for one that might be Tontout's. But the same hope was not in his breast, nor the same fear. Certainty had taken their place. Tontout was dead, despoiled of her beauty and her life as his mother had been. A fury triumphed over him that was as possessive in its effect as the color which blazed about him in the crimson bush. It had been growing in him since the moment he knelt at his father's side; it had strained at the bounds of his grief when he found his mother; it had filled him with madness, still unformed in his brain, when he covered their faces in the early dawn. Now he knew why he gripped the English hatchet so tightly. He wanted to kill. His eyes turned from the smoke-filled valley of the Richelieu to the sea where Champlain lay gleaming in the sun miles away, and the hand which held the hatchet trembled in its new-born yearning for the life blood of a people whom he hated from this day and hour.

He was vaguely conscious of the whine of the mill wheel as he went down into the valley. He did not feel fear or the necessity for concealing his movement, for death would not trouble itself to return to a desolation so complete. But the wheel, as he drew nearer, touched the stillness with a note which seemed to ride with strange insistence over the solitude, as if calling to some one. It became less a thing of iron and wood than was crying in its hunger for oil, that was crying in its hunger for oil, and more a voice which demanded his attention. It seemed to him that suddenly he caught what it was saying: "The English beast—the little English beast"—repeating those words until they became a rhythm without a break in their monotony except when a capful of wind set the wheel going faster. It was as if a thought in his brain had been stolen from him. And what it expressed was true. He was the English beast, coming as Madame Tontout had predicted. Tontout had been right. Fiends with white skins, who were of his blood, had sent him a lone ghost to prove it. And like a lone ghost he was left to see it all. The mill wheel knew and, even in moments of quiet, seemed to possess the power to tell him so.

With stubborn fortitude he faced the gehenna through which he knew he must pass before he could turn south to find his vengeance with as much as his mother's, and it was for her he began to search.

In a ditch which had run almost under the eaves of the looped porch, he stumbled on a body. It had fallen among tall grass and weeds and had remained hidden there. It wore a Mohawk war tunic, and in one of its stained hands was a jackknife. He looked at it like the one Jeems had. A scalp was at the warrior's belt, and for a moment Jeems turned sick.

As he advanced, he could see there had been an alarm and a little fighting. There was old Jean de Lauson, the cure, doubled up like a jackknife, forlorn and scarcely living, and he began to rise in his breast as he came to Tontout's hill—an unreasoning thought that something might have driven his Uncle Hepsibah to the Richelieu, a hope that, after lighting his signal fire, he had hurried to the manor with the expectation of finding his people there. His father must have seen Hepsibah's warning across Forbidden valley, and had waited, disbelieving, while death traveled with the shades of night through the lowlands.

Many Theories About National Flag Design

There are various theories regarding the origin of the design of our national flag, and most historians do not consider the Betsy Ross legend as trustworthy. It is true that Washington's family coat-of-arms contained both stars and stripes, but these had been used in other flags before 1776. The Grand Union flag, the first to float over the navy, consisted of 13 stripes, alternately red and white, with a union bearing the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew, signifying the mother country. Some historians believe that the stripes were taken from the flag and the stars from the colonial banner of Rhode Island. Others maintain that the idea of the flag came from the Netherlands, as Franklin and Adams, who were sent to that country to borrow money for aid, told the Dutch that America had borrowed much from them, including the ideas represented in the flag. Another claim is that the stars were taken from the 13-starred constellation Lyra and signified "harmony."

West Point's Memorial to a Master of Swords

A view of the memorial erected to Lieut. Col. Herman J. Koehler, in charge of the physical development of the cadets at the United States Military academy at West Point from 1885 to 1923. Koehler, a "master of swords," was popular with the officers and cadets and their appreciation of his work led the Association of Graduates to erect the memorial in the entrance hall to the gymnasium building.

Tells of Dangers on Volcano Flight

Hop Over Aniakchak "Prelude to Hell," Priest Says.

Santa Clara, Calif.—A graphic description of his recent flight across the volcano Aniakchak is given by Father Bernard J. Hubbard, famed "pope of the snows," in dispatches from Alaska. Aniakchak is the world's largest active volcano, and was successfully spanned by the Santa Clara university priest in a plane piloted by Harry Blunt. The plane was nearly sucked into the crater.

"It was the most terrible prelude of hell that I ever imagined," Father Hubbard informed friends at Shiglik, Alaska, from his base camp at Kijulik bay.

Crater Changed.—"The great moon of the crater was completely changed from its shape last year," he said. "Where we hunted caribou and picked flowers last year is now inside the crater. A high fissure, many miles long splits the southwestern floor of the crater and the mountain in the center has blown up and is still erupting."

In the southeastern crater floor there are two new pits which resemble a huge coliseum. They are sending out smoke and cinders continually.

Deafness Blessing for This Man's Neighbor

Seattle, Wash.—Several hours of patient troling finally repaid Ronald Egerer when he landed a large trout—one of the biggest fish he had ever caught—and he happily contemplated the meal it would make. He proudly showed it to his wife, who suggested that the neighbors ought to see it before it was cooked. Egerer put it on a platter and went next door. The neighbor took the platter, examined the fish, then turned to enter the house. "Thanks, old man," he flung back; "mighty nice of you to give me this fish. I'll make a swell meal for the family."

Small Beetle Aiding in Fight on Forest Worms

Newberry, Mich.—A small beetle has come to the rescue of forests in the upper peninsula infested with a small worm which has stripped trees of leaves, according to reports.

Aid has been sought from the entomology department at Michigan State college and the response was that the beetle could be killed only by airplane dusting. When a trip was made through the forests recently, however, it was reported that the worms were diminishing in numbers and that they were seen to have been eaten by the beetles.

These Puppies Should Be Air-Minded

The puppies were born in the cockpit of an antiquated airplane in one of the hangars at Roosevelt field.

'Tis an Old Story, But It's Still Good

Columbia, Pa.—Tubs full of rain water were offered as evidence here to substantiate a report that during a recent storm it "rained frogs and tadpoles." Pools of water accumulating after the shower were "literally alive" with the amphibious creatures, said observers. Several residents carried cans of rain water containing the frogs and junior frogs to the office of the Columbia News.

Duck Escapes With Trap

Harriaburg, Pa.—A wild mallard duck with a steel trap attached to its leg has been seen flying over Beaver Creek near Downingtown, Pa. The bird apparently is not handicapped in flying.

Unsinkable Boat Latest French Invention

Latest Craft May Revolutionize Navigation.

Vichy.—Possibilities of the complete revolution of the factor of safety in navigation appeared when experiments on a 25-foot model of an unsinkable boat, held in the River Allier here, were completely successful. The inventor of the craft, Joseph Chartrain of Clermont-Ferrand, has refused to reveal any details of his method and the high naval officers who witnessed the experiments made no comment except to express their satisfaction.

The little boat, constructed of sheet steel and weighing 1,820 pounds, was moored in the Allier. The first step was to smash over 50 holes in the hull below the waterline. The boat settled slightly, but preserved entire navigability. The holes, on the basis of scale comparison, are equal to those which would be made by a 24-inch shell. No shells of this size are in use.

The boat was next loaded with 1,700 pounds of lead, well over her own weight, without settling at all. Tilted to an angle of 45 degrees, and handicapped by the holes and the load, she righted herself immediately. A police guard was set over the boat immediately after the experiments, pending the decision of the government on whether to buy the discovery and its eventual disposal by other day.

Ancient Buggy Causes Horse to Run Away

The Dalles, Ore.—A runaway of all things—started The Dalles the other day. It all happened when Nat Garman's kids hitched a horse to an ancient buggy. The horse bolted down the street while numerous young Garman tumbled out of the buggy. The horse did not stop until the buggy was overturned.

MAYOR FORTY YEARS

Capt. Harry Wooding, a veteran of the Civil war, who served with the Confederate cavalry forces, is serving his fortieth year as mayor of Danville, Va. Captain Wooding was first elected mayor in 1892, during the Cleveland administration, and has served without a break since that time. He is eighty-seven years old and in splendid health, being proud of the fact that he hasn't spent $10 in doctor's bills in the last forty years.

Blow Revives Terrier Instead of Killing It

St. Louis, Mo.—Babe, a two-year-old fox terrier, became so ill in a recent bout with a cold that Mr. and Mrs. Otto Walkenhorst decided death would be merciful. So they called the police. "The officers said Babe could live only a few hours, anyway, and it would be better to kill her." The patrolman took Babe outside. One policeman hit her a tremendous blow on the head. The body was covered with a carpet, but the children wanted one last look at the pup. Babe opened her eyes, and Mrs. Walkenhorst screamed. "She looked up so pitifully that we brought her inside and massaged her. In the morning she was up to meet the milkman as usual. We believed the blow on the head, instead of killing Babe, really made her well again, because she romps about now as she never did before," Walkenhorst said.

OB SINCLAIR, "SUGAR DADDY"

By FANNIE HURST

(By McGraw-Hill Newspaper Syndicate.)
(N.Y. Service.)

ACCORDING to the six photographs of slim Obidiah Sinclair, which Letty Leigh had on her dresser, he had not taken on weight up to about the age of thirty-four.

As a matter of fact that was true. The Obidiah Sinclair who left his small up-state town at thirty-five was still within the normal range. It was in the next ten years that obesity began to set in.

People said that it was because he began to sow his wild oats at the age when most men are finished with them. There might have been some truth in that. The up-state boy who had plodded through the first half of his life with his nose close to the grindstone, earning a frugal living in a frugal town, had not had much time for play. It had been due to his capacity for drudgery, that at thirty-five, he had accumulated a fair fortune, considering the size of the town called Empire.

It was not unnatural that the new world, the new whirl, the new excitement, of a city like New York, should sweep a man like Ob Sinclair, as he came to be called, off his feet.

And that is what it did. Less than three years after his arrival in the metropolis, Ob had not only more than quadrupled in Wall Street the fortune he had made in Empire in dairy products, but he had become known along Broadway as a "sugar daddy."

There are synonyms and equivalents of "sugar daddy." Butter-and-egg man. Angel. But as Ob began to take on weight and his jaws to fall into soft folds of flesh, "sugar daddy" somehow seemed his more apt pseudonym.

In a few short years Ob had frankly become the show girls' darling. He hung around their stage doors. He sent them flowers. He wrote them love letters. He bought them forbidden wine. He gave parties in his flat where adult men and women actually indulged in the obsolete pastime of drinking champagne out of satin slippers.

When Ob performed this ritual in his satin-and-gold flat where a party of fourteen was present, he did it with complete consciousness of what he was doing. He was aware of the complete unconsciousness of what he was doing. He was aware of the complete unconsciousness of what he was doing.

Who was he, Ob Sinclair, to be sitting in a satin-and-gold flat in New York, surrounded by all these glittering people of the glittering show-world, drinking champagne from the satin cup of a little dancer who was the toast of the town?

Well, Ob was going to make the best of his opportunities. Before Mirabel Moneytoes had left his flat that night, there was tucked away in the adorable little bodice of the frock she wore, substantial evidence of Ob's appreciation of the miracle that had befallen him.

It was curious, but with all his lack of astuteness in his dealings with people in a world so alien to him, Ob in the beginning never for a moment forgot just what his relationship was. As the town began to wag about Mirabel's new "sugar daddy," Ob knew precisely to what he owed the great privilege of his title. Money. And Ob, who was by then in the seven figure class of finance, never for a moment forgot it.

Mirabel Moneytoes had a flat, or rather a bungalow built especially for her on top of the twenty-first story of one of the town's smartest hotels. She had a special-body car of Italian make, said to be the most expensive limousine ever brought into America. Ob literally covered the slender forearms of the little dancer in bands of jewels.

As for Mirabel, with an instinct of the fair play of give and take, she showered upon Ob in return her dainty charm and whiffled about for all the world like a humming bird, conscious of its brief life and greedy for the honey while it lasted.

It is difficult to know at just what point Ob's sane appraisement of the situation began to collapse. After two or three years of maintaining his position along the Rialto as "sugar daddy" to the lovely little dancer, Ob began to cast the glowing eyes of Mirabel upon his little pet. After all, her smile was so ready for him, her endearments so profuse, her eagerness to do his bidding so spontaneous.

It began to dawn upon Ob, slowly and with a sweetness that was terrifying, that this bit of loveliness might be permanently his. He began secretly to plan for the permanent capture of the little Mirabel. More freely than ever he met her demands; with more prodigal liberality he supported the group of slim young boys who danced attendance upon her. There again Ob felt himself to be wise. He knew the call of youth to youth. He never denied her this call. He was generous with her boyish suitors and up to a certain point, let them hang round her and dance attendance. Mirabel knew that point and never once had she erred.

"Sugar daddy" came first. About the end of the fourth year, just as Ob, keyed to a pitch of self-confidence beyond anything he had ever dreamed, was about to venture to make demand for the permanent ownership by way of marriage of the lovely Mirabel, one of her young men, whom Ob had employed for the purpose of giving him a living, absconded with the sum of several hundred thousand dollars of Ob's money.

It was proof of Mirabel's great hold upon Ob that she succeeded in preventing pursuit and prosecution. By sheer force of her curiously dominant will power, she prevailed upon Ob to let the crime go by default and against his every instinct of integrity, he gave in.

Six months later, on a blow that came overnight, as it were, little Mirabel joined her absconding lover where he was living in seclusion on a Mediterranean island, leaving Ob, in the phraseology of a gossipy Broadway, "cold and flat."

The extraordinary part of it was that old Ob, blighted, -wounded, stricken, humiliated, picked himself up after the first blank shock and resumed his role of "sugar daddy."

He is "sugar daddy" today, to one after another of the little humming birds of Broadway. And one by one he is deserted by them.

Deathless to Ob is the thrill of "sugar daddy."

He still hangs around the stage doors. He still sends flowers. He still writes love letters. He still gives parties in his flat where adult men and women actually indulge in the obsolete pastime of drinking champagne out of satin slippers.

To him it is still the most stimulating, exciting and miraculous circumstance that has ever happened to him—the fact that musical comedy darlings actually sup with him in his apartment and that he, Ob Sinclair from Empire, New York, tilts incredibly small satin slippers to his lips and sips champagne out of them.

It seemed to Ob that the vagaries of fate were still treating him to a ride down life that was as thrilling as a scot along a Coney Island scenic railway. And after his years of sugar-daddying he still asks himself the question: Who was he, Ob Sinclair, to be sitting in a satin-and-gold flat in New York, surrounded by all these glittering people of the glittering show-world, drinking champagne from the satin slipper of a little dancer who was the latest toast of the town?

As the town still wagged about his "sugar daddy" reputation, Ob hadn't forgotten to what he owed the great privilege of his title. Money. Well, Ob was still making the best of his opportunities.

Back in Empire, Miss Letty Leigh, who has loved him with a secret and hopeless passion since they romped up-state meadows together, sits in her quiet house, and day by day regards with the eyes of her hopeless passion, the six photographs of Ob that line her dresser.

Women Collegians Have Good Marital Records

"College graduates," said the president of one women's college, "may not marry so early and often, but they marry late and until they die." Divorce among this group is practically at the vanishing point.

In the United States at large in 1928 there was one divorce for every seven marriages and the percentage is steadily rising. Elizabeth Fraser tells us, in the Saturday Evening Post. But in the statistical figure for college women is one divorce to forty-nine marriages, or around 2 per cent.

This is a proud record, and it would appear that a college education is an excellent first aid for maintaining the stability of marriage. One reason for this greater permanence is that college girls give the marital prospect a thorough once-over before and not after the wedding march, they enter the married state with a clearer understanding of the problems and responsibilities involved.

The records show that, in the past, college graduates have been slow at marrying, somewhat cautious in the uptake, not prone to midnight elopements under the double-distilled glamour of the hip flask and the moon. But on the other hand, they never know when to stop. They may remain steadfastly celibate until fifty and then suddenly pop off.

For them there is no closed season or dead line of frosty age. Nearly always they choose a companion of suitable years. Looking at the statistics of the more recent classes, one is struck by the significant fact that the college graduate has turned over a new leaf in the marrying business; she has pressed her foot on the accelerator and has put on more speed. She is now a close competitor of the Junior leaguers, who claim that 75 per cent of all their members wed.

Army Car Has Speed

The new "battle wagon" of the United States army is in its appearance different from anything of the kind that has been used. It is manned by three men and has a speed of 60 miles an hour when desired. It has a light turret with two machine guns. It sets low and can run over almost any kind of rough ground.

Lesson for September 13

SOME MISSIONARY EXPERIENCES

LESSON TEXT—Acts 14:1-18.

GOLDEN TEXT—Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for they shall receive the kingdom of heaven.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Some Missionary Adventures.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Some Missionary Adventures.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Hardships of Missionaries.

IC—Hardships of Missionaries.

IC—Christianity Facing Other Religions.

1. Paul and Barnabas Preaching at Iconium (vv. 1-7).

Their experience here was much the same as at Antioch. They entered the Jewish synagogue and preached, causing a multitude of Jews and Gentiles to believe. The unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles to the most bitter opposition. Concerning their work in Iconium observe:

1. Their manner of preaching (v. 1). They "spoke" that is, a great multitude believed. They were true preachers. Only that which brings conviction of sin and induces decisions for Christ can be truly said to be preaching in the biblical sense. It is not enough merely to bring the truth to the people. It must be brought in such a way that men and women will be induced to decide for Christ.

2. Their attitude toward opposition (v. 3). This is suggested by the word "therefore." The opposition did not prevent their preaching but incited them to continue preaching. Christian workers should not give up work because of opposition.

3. Their preaching accompanied with miracles (v. 8). Since the opposition was so fierce, the Lord granted special help in his vindication of their testimony.

4. The effect of their preaching (v. 4). The multitude of the city was divided. Where men faithfully preach the gospel there will be division.

5. Paul and Barnabas assaulted (vv. 5-7). The Jews and the Gentiles united in this assault. Being apprised of this effort, Paul and Barnabas fled to Lystra and Derbe, where they preached the gospel.

II. An Attempt to Worship Paul and Barnabas as Gods (vv. 8-13).

1. The occasion (vv. 8-10). It was the healing of a lame man. God's gracious power shown in healing this lame man occasioned new difficulties. That which ought to have been a help was turned into a hindrance.

2. The man who was healed (v. 11). A notable miracle. The man had been a cripple since birth. On hearing Paul preach, faith was born in his heart (Rom. 10:17). When Paul perceived that he trusted Christ, he called with a loud voice that all could hear for the man to stand upright. The cure was instantaneous, for he leaped up and walked (v. 10).

3. The method (vv. 11-13). They called Barnabas Jupiter, and Paul Mercurius because he was the chief speaker. The priest of Jupiter brought oxen and garlands ready to offer sacrifices unto these men (v. 13). In the person of Jesus Christ God has actually appeared to man (John 1:14; Phil. 2:7, 8).

4. Their efforts frustrated (vv. 14-18). This foolish act was happily averted by the fact of the apostles as exhibited in the address of the occasion:

a. They denied that they were divine beings.

b. They directed them to turn away from these vain things unto the living God who made heaven and earth.

III. The Stoning of Paul (vv. 19-22). Wicked Jews from Antioch and Iconium pursued Paul with relentless hate to this place where they stirred up the very people who had been willing to worship them a short time before. This shows that satanic worship can soon be turned into satanic hate. This hatred took form in the stoning of Paul and the dragging of him out of the city for dead. Having been raised up by God, he with undaunted courage pressed on with his duties as a missionary bearing the good tidings to the lost. Soon after this, Paul turned back and revisited the places where he had preached, telling them that through great tribulation they must enter into the Kingdom of God.

IV. The Organization of Churches in the Field (vv. 23-26).

Evangelization with Paul did not mean a hasty and superficial preaching of the gospel, but the establishment of a permanent work. Elders were appointed in every church. The work of the missionary is not done until there is established on the field self-governing and self-propagating churches.

Christ's Coming

My friends, all the singing about it in the world will not bring the coming of Christ a day nearer—and there are no songs of the Christian church which so fill my heart with gladness and joy as those which tell of Christ's coming. But service will—J. Stuart Holden.

Travel Prints Are Talk of Town

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

WITH the back-to-the-city movement, which looks well be bringing wandering vacationists into an environment of schoolroom, office and campus, comes the urge for something stunning and thoroughly practical to wear during the busy autumn days.

There is no doubt about the answer to this call for a chic and all-around fall costume. All fashiondom "hats" fall costume. All fashiondom is proclaiming the good news about the dress or jacket-suit made of the new travel prints (some call them "city prints") which do not wrinkle or crush and which are patterned in the most fetching colors one may ever hope to see. And are they truly so? They are just that. So much so that they are just that. So much so that they are just that.

MISS MEAT, MEET MR. SWEET

(By Betty Barclay)

"Oh, East is East and West is West and never the twain shall meet," may be the poet's idea of things, but the dietitian in her kitchen shakes her head negatively. To her, almost any food may be introduced to almost any other with a fair chance that it will be loved at first sight.

Witness the affinity of cranberry jelly with roast turkey, of apple sauce with roast pork, horseradish with cold meats, lemon juice with fish, or mint sauce with lamb. How impossible such combinations would seem if we did not know that they were delicious.

And now comes sugar, gallantly wooing meats of all kinds; not really as the title might suggest, to make them taste sweet, but, without sweetening, to give them a greater all-around appetite appeal. Salt and pepper have long been chief rivals for the affection of Miss Meat, but the new suitor has appeared to make the wooing more interesting. This time it hardly seems that old loves are the best, for the new comer has in some magic way, greatly influenced Miss Meat and made her more delectable than she has ever been.

The average housewife spends from one-third to one-fourth of her food allowance on meat. Upon her selection of this, her main dish, depends all her other dinner purchases, for meat is the foundation upon which she builds her menu. It is desirable, therefore, that she secure every particle of flavor and nutriment it contains.

There are several methods by which the flavor of meat may be improved. The base for all is seasoning. Marinades, sauces, strong juiced vegetables, and spices are all employed to add savoriness to the finished dish and increase the rich flavor of the meat. In preparing the three former, also in cooking the meat itself, the judicious use of granulated sugar is now advised. Without sweetening, it mellows the flavor and increases the delicacy of the finer cuts, induces a crisp, quickly-forming crust which seals in the juices, causes the gravies to brown quickly and adds a slight brilliancy to it.

With the coarser, tougher sections of meat, sugar produces gratifying results. In searing these meats, a method usually followed, the addition of sugar to the salt and pepper rubbed into the meat, produces a caramelization which adds immeasurably to the flavor of both meat and gravy.

When roasting meats, add one teaspoonful of sugar to one teaspoonful of salt, one quarter teaspoonful of pepper and one tablespoonful of flour. Rub this mixture thoroughly into the surface of the meat which is then placed in a roasting pan without water or other liquid and seared in a hot oven (500 degrees F.). Then, if necessary, from a half to one cupful of hot water may be added and the cooking of the meat continued at a lower temperature. Some people have feared that the salting of meat before cooking would draw out the juices, but by adding sugar to the salt and other seasonings this will not be the case. The sugar caramelizes quickly and prevents the flow of the juice. Try these recipes if you wish final proof of the value of this novel method of seasoning:

Broiled Round or Rump Steak
Select a steak cut 1 to 1 1/4 inches thick. Rub into it a mixture of 1 teaspoonful each of salt and sugar and 1/4 teaspoonful of pepper. Brush a hot skillet or broiler with fat and place the steak to cook. Turn now and then until done to your taste. Serve on a hot platter, dotting butter over the meat before serving.

Beef Piquante

Dredge two pounds of bottom round steak with flour and pepper. Sauté in four tablespoons of beef or bacon fat, with a small slice of onion, until well browned on both sides. Add three cups of water or meat stock, one slice of lemon, one slice of orange, one tablespoonful of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt and one-half cup dried apricots. Bring to the boiling point and cook slowly for one hour. Thicken a little, add more salt if necessary, and serve.

Club Chops

Sear pork chops lightly on both sides. On each chop place one slice of onion, a slice of tomato and a teaspoonful of minced green pepper and parsley. Season each chop with 1/4 teaspoonful of salt, 1/4 teaspoonful of pepper and 1/2 teaspoonful of sugar. Cover with a tablespoonful of buttered bread crumbs. Bake in a hot oven until the chops are tender.

FOUND DEAD AT THE BREAKFAST TABLE

W. C. McNabb, 64, well known Auburn resident, died suddenly

Tuesday morning while seated at the breakfast table from a heart attack. He was associated with his son-in-law, William Gugerli, in a stock food grinding mill. He was born on a farm in Cedar Creek township, Allen county. For several years he conducted a meat market at Spencerville and for 25 years was in the same business in Auburn. The deceased served as a member of the city council under two mayors, J. Y. W. McClellan and George O. Dennison, from 1904 to 1912. He was a member of the Royal Arch Masons and of the Knights of Pythias lodge. Surviving besides the widow is a daughter, Mrs. Ursel Gugerli of Auburn, two brothers, John and Grover McNabb and two sisters, Mrs. Maude Swartz and Mrs. Margaret Witmer, all living in Cedar Creek township.

The fourteenth annual reunion of the Snyder family was held on Labor Day at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George Walter, north of St. Joe. Sixty-six relatives and friends enjoyed the day.

SPENCERVILLE MEN WANT POSSESSION OF GARAGE

Wm. G. Erick, Frank L. Butler and Merritt A. Butler have sued Vinton L. Miller in the DeKalb circuit court for possession of a garage property in Spencerville for failure to pay rent.

The garage was leased to the defendant last March 26 at $100 per month, but the plaintiffs say none of the rent has been paid. They also ask that their title to the property be quieted as against the defendant, who is claiming some interest in it.

The plaintiffs and the defendant were surety on a note executed by F. W. Silberg and the plaintiffs and defendant were given a deed to the garage property by Silberg as security. The plaintiffs say they afterward assumed the debt and that Miller made no payment on it. The plaintiffs' attorneys are Atkinson & Huselman.

USE OF POOR FUNDS ABUSED, ORR SAYS

"The wholesale plundering of poor funds in certain townships of the state is a disgrace to a civilized community," asserted Lawrence F. Orr, chief examiner of the state board of accounts.

The law, said Mr. Orr, intends that the poor fund shall be distributed to the needy and is not "for political and individual plunder by any official." He told of instances that have come to the attention of the board of accounts where the funds in question have not been administered in accordance with the law.

Stressing importance of an aroused interest on the part of citizens in public matters, Orr said that "it is high time that the people take a hand in their own affairs." Public indifference in government, he asserted, has been largely responsible for abuses in the expenditure of money raised by taxation.

Cars and Charity
It is certain that charity is not going to the purchase of gasoline in Huntington township, Huntington county, Indiana. Dale Kreigh, the trustee, makes it a rule to take up the automobile licenses of persons asking for charity.

There are exceptions to the rule, of course. If the car is an unquestioned necessity, the plates may be retained. On the other hand, tax money is not going to be spent to provide motor fuel for joy riding. If a man has to work, he has time to walk on all reasonable errands, according to this trustee.

Ride and go hungry; walk and eat, may seem a harsh ruling; but it probably will be very popular with those who pay the taxes. And a trustee needs all the popularity he can find. His single consolation is that not many would care to have his job of caring for the poor.

SIX LOCAL FARMERS WIN PREMIUMS

South Side Market and Fair held at Fort Wayne, Saturday last Monday, drew large crowds and a number of gardeners from this section figured in winning some of the awards.

Melons—First, Cleve Washler; second, Roy Keller.

Miscellaneous—Second Howard Shilling, and third, Clyde Hart.

Dairy—First, J. J. Hart. Poultry and Eggs—First, Ora Wilmut; third, Fred Hart.

Exhibitors.
In all there were ninety-eight Mrs. Stella Goldsmith of Spencerville and B. V. Widney of Columbia City were among the judges.

Outlaws' Refuge
No Man's land was the region 170 miles in length and about 85 miles in width north of Texas. It was added to the United States in 1890 and made a part of Oklahoma in 1890. Between these years the district was under no form of government and became a resort of outlaws.

THIRTY-NINE MEN ATTEND DINNER

Col. Melton of Gary, member of the State Highway Commission, was indeed surprised when thirty-nine men from Hamilton, Butler, St. Joe and Spencerville, assembled at the Butler Hotel Monday noon to welcome him on his visit to DeKalb county, and to drive with him over a stretch of road seventeen miles north of Butler to Road 20, and after dinner to Fort Wayne by way of St. Joe, Spencerville and Leo.

Following the dinner, Col. Melton was introduced by Dr. Poffenberger, who is heading the road movement in this section of DeKalb county.

For some time this stretch of county road has been advocated as one which the highway commission ought to take into its system, maintain and improve, and this is the first inspection tour that had been planned.

Col. Melton stated that the commission was able to pave about 500 miles per year, paying every cent as they go, and not calling upon the tax payers for one cent by taxation. Thus, if no more roads were added to the system it would take 6 years to catch up with its paving program.

New roads are continually being taken into its system and by carefully going over the conditions of each road, improvements are being made that are satisfactory and will last a number of years, without concrete pavement. Several types of dustless roads are being built under the state program.

It is hoped, of course, that this section of DeKalb county may receive favorable consideration at the hands of the commission and we believe it will as they are not making special demands upon our district member of the commission. So far the spirit of "What have you to give us" has been carried out.

HOME BUREAU NOTICE

The Home Bureau will meet this week Friday at the home of Harriett Draggo at Concord. The date was changed on the program so as not to conflict with the Hicksville fair date, then the fair date was changed, hence the club date is changed back to the third Friday as usual. There will be election of officers so a good attendance is desired.

The R. H. C. was entertained at Mrs. W. L. Hamilton's Tuesday afternoon. Special numbers were given by Mrs. Abner Troschel. Mrs. Fred Hart gave an interesting reading which provoked much mirth. The club accepted an invitation from Mrs. Hugh Neiland of Auburn to meet with her in the near future. The guests were Mrs. Neva Hursh, Mrs. Ruth Davis and Mrs. Vivian Murphy. Responses were Indiana authors and some of their writings. The next meeting will be with Mrs. Louis Washler.

ALLEN COUNTY YOUNG MEN'S REPUBLICAN CLUB

The Allen County Young Men's Republican Club will again resume their activities, after a summer vacation, with one of their popular luncheon meetings, Wednesday noon, D. S. T., September 23, 1931.

At a recent business meeting, they decided to change the noon luncheon meetings from weekly to every second and fourth Wednesdays of each month, until the first of January, 1932; together with three evening meetings, namely the middle of October, November and December.

Their earnest endeavor is to make each of these meetings as attractive as possible, and are aiming to procure the best speaking talent obtainable.

They extend a cordial invitation to our Republican readers to attend, especially the initial Autumn meeting, Wednesday noon (D. S. T.) Sept. 23, 1931, at Y. M. C. A., Fort Wayne.

TAKEN FOR RIDE AND HOLD-UP

The automobile of Clyde Scott, poolroom proprietor of High and Maple streets, Hicksville, who was taken for a ride and robbed of $25 by two men and a woman Saturday night, was found abandoned near the Aspacher farm, west of Brunersburg, near the DeKalb-Hicksville pike, and returned to Scott late Sunday by Sheriff Fred E. Warfield.

After closing his business place about midnight Saturday, Scott purchased some groceries and then drove to his home at Smith and Bryan streets. When he stepped out of his machine, an unmasked man shoved a pistol into his ribs and ordered him to re-enter his car. Scott obeyed the command.

The gunman then forced Scott to drive around Hicksville for a time before ordering him to go out Fountain street. After a time Scott noticed a Ford coupe following them. When they were near the site of Sunset Gardens, burned dance hall, the gunman compelled Scott to stop.

The coupe, containing another man and a woman, halted along side. While the gunman kept Scott covered, the newcomers frisked him, taking about $25 in cash. The couple then returned to the coupe and the gunman followed them in Scott's car.

Scott telephoned Sheriff Warfield who took him back to Hicksville.

COUNTY NURSE RESIGNS

Miss Edna Grabel, DeKalb county visiting nurse, Saturday sent her resignation to Dr. W. W. Swarts, county health commissioner. She left on Sept. 16 to accept another position near Indianapolis. Miss Grabel's contract does not expire until the first of the year but in view of the fact that her salary was cut from $150 to $100 a month effective Jan. 1 by the county council, she decided to tender her resignation and accept the one near Indianapolis. The new position pays $150 a month, the same salary she was receiving in DeKalb county.

M. A. BUTLER LANDS TWO BRIDGE CONTRACTS

Contracts for the construction of six bridges were awarded Wednesday by the DeKalb county commissioners as follows:

Bishop bridge in Butler township, to Ray L. Harris of Fort Wayne for $178.30.

Houlton bridge in Franklin township, to Mr. Harris for $251.60.

Potter bridge in Franklin township, to Mr. Harris for $368.60.

Waterman bridge in Wilmington township, to M. A. Butler of Spencerville for $180.48.

Clark bridge in Keyser township, to J. E. Sweet & Son of Woodburn for $2,460.

Lowe bridge in Franklin township, to Mr. Butler for $1,328.

The Potter, Clark and Lowe bridges are new while the others are repair work. The jobs sold low due to the keen competition.

BOYS MAKE TRIP TO ALABAMA

For the benefit of those who would travel to the Gulf States or points in Florida and, at the request of the editor, I'll give you an outline of some of the points of interest to be seen on two routes. Namely U. S. 31 or Dixie Highway to south Alabama and back via U. S. 29 to Greenville, S. C.; U. S. 25 east to Richmond, Ky.; U. S. 227 to Paris, Ky. and U. S. 27 to Fort Wayne, Ind. A few detours are encountered to lead you off occasionally, but good roads all the way.

Charles Bassett and myself and family left St. Joe Wednesday morning, August 26, 1931, about 8:30 in a Chevrolet touring car and trailer carrying some of our belongings and camp equipment. The first day it rained nearly all the forenoon and scattered showers in the afternoon. We camped just below Indianapolis the first night in a new tourist camp. Thursday we stopped in Greenwood and seen the old home of James Whitcomb Riley, which is now a curio shop in his memory. Passing on thru Edinburg with its big college to Seymour, a large town on the B. & O. S. W. and New Albany where we cross the Ohio River on the new K. & I. toll bridge at Louisville, Ky.

Here we took the "Western Parkway" around town and avoiding traffic, passing thru Shawnee Park and by one of Ford's plants and a large oil refinery. About thirty miles farther on we began to meet soldiers in drill from Camp Knox. Several hundred were met with their equipment. (Nineteen more miles to Elizabethtown where the land began to get more rolling and the scenery more beautiful. Here we began to see large acreage of Sorghum cane and tobacco. Soon we were to come into the land of caves with all their mystery. Thursday night was spent on top of Mammoth Onyx Cave, just a-

Button Game

Take a piece of cardboard nine inches square. Draw on it with a crayon, this diagram. Take three small black buttons and three small white ones. There should be two players only. One has the black buttons and one has the white. The first player places a button on any one of the nine dots. The second does likewise. Each plays in turn until all the buttons have been placed. Then each in turn moves buttons from dot to dot by way of the lines, continuing until one player succeeds in placing "three men in a row." This player wins the game.

Deaf Mute Invents

Devices to Aid Others
Cambridge, Mass.—William E. Shaw, himself a deaf mute, has invented 54 devices intended to make life easier for those who cannot see or hear. Among his inventions are a "talkies" telephone, a noiseless doorbell, a silent alarm clock and a typewriter which spells words in electric lights.

Uncle Sam's pay roll in 1930 included more than 520,000 men and almost 80,000 women.

The Kitchen Cabinet

Leftover cake or cookies will make a quick pudding if served with this:
Caramel Nut Sauce.—Melt four tablespoonsful of butter in a saucepan, add one and one-fourth cupsful of brown sugar, three-fourths of a cupful of corn syrup and three-fourths of a cupful of evaporated milk. Cook to the soft ball stage before adding the milk. Then with the milk add one-fourth cupful of chopped pecans.

Butterscotch Sauce.—Put into a saucepan one-half pound of brown sugar, two-thirds of a cupful of corn syrup and four tablespoonsful of butter. Boil to a soft ball stage, add three-fourths of a cupful of cream and serve with nuts. Stir well before using.

Marshmallow Mint Sauce.—Boil one cupful of sugar and one-half cupful of water five minutes, add sixteen marshmallows cut into pieces and pour slowly, over the stiffly beaten egg whites. Flavor with two drops of the oil of peppermint.

Gateau Princess.—Bake a sponge cake in two layers. Cut the center from one, leaving a rim of one and one-half inches wide. On the layer heap crushed berries, jam or jelly; place the rim and cover the rim with icing or with whipped cream. With ripe whole berries well sugared and heaped in the center this makes a most attractive dessert.

Ginger Buns.—Prepare a ginger cream, using the preserved ginger, the syrup and egg yolks with cream. Serve in sherbet glasses and pour over a spoonful or two of ginger ale. Plain vanilla ice cream may be used instead of the ginger cream; garnish with a maraschino cherry.

Mutton With Apples.—Take two pounds of mutton steak cut into serving sized pieces and trim off surplus fat. Roll each piece in seasoned flour and brown in a little fat in the frying pan. Arrange in the baking dish and cover with sliced onions and apples, using three apples and two onions. Sprinkle with salt and pepper and a tablespoonful of sugar. Just before serving spread with mint jelly. Serve at once.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"To Beat Hollow"

ONE of the most peculiar things about language is its quirks and twists—the unpredictable turns it takes.

Consider, for instance, the expression, "To Beat Hollow" which we understand to beat thoroughly or wholly. Perhaps by this time some of our keen readers have already sensed what we are driving at. We hasten to point out the interesting fact that "to beat hollow"—which, taken literally, would be a more or less impossible feat—is simply a corruption of "to beat wholly"—and having exactly the same sense.

Just how it came to be so corrupted nobody can say. It was probably a chance development due to a mispronunciation of the original word.

At any rate, by 1750, the present phrase had received literary sanction through its use by James Townley, in his play "High Life Below Stairs."

Why Called "Old Bailey"

A bailey was an open space enclosed by a fortification. If more than one line of fortification was present there was an inner bailey and an outer bailey. "Old Bailey" in London is situated in one of the baileys that was a part of the old fortifications.

LIGHTS OF NEW YORK

By WALTER TRUMBULL

It wasn't so many years ago that the majority of children in the United States never had seen an airplane. Now there is scarcely a child who doesn't know all about airplanes, but do you realize that there are many children who never have seen a street car? I didn't realize it, until some one spoke of it. In many sections busses have taken over the problem of transportation; have become common carriers to the extent that even the old street rails have crumbled to red rust. There is, for example, a small town in Maryland where two old-time street cars rest dusty and lifeless in a decrepit barn. The children go to see them much as they might go to see a cannon used in the Civil war. They call them "street wagons."

Speaking of airplanes, my wife, Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Kent of Port Washington, and Dwight Morrow, Jr., of Amherst college, who were recent passengers on a transcontinental plane, all appear to have been well satisfied with the meals served en route. I am told that, for lunch, each passenger was given a hard boiled egg, some sandwiches, an apple, a peach, and a piece of cake, which seems ample. I hope they didn't throw the peach stones aboard. I should hate to be hit by a peach pit dropped from the height at which I last saw that plane. It would be considerably worse than trying to catch a baseball thrown from the Empire State building. Did you ever hear about the time they got Wilbert Robinson to try to catch a baseball dropped from a low flying baby blimp? The rumor is that, instead of a baseball, some one with a distorted sense of humor dropped a ripe orange.

Several of my friends this summer have adopted the college fashion of going without hats. Not only is this hard on check room attendants, but it lends to complications. One of these hatless heroes went into a department store to buy something for his wife—at least, he claims it was for his wife. At any rate, a woman approached him and demanded to know where cold creams were kept. He told her that as far as he knew they generally were kept in a bath cabinet. This answer didn't satisfy her and she reported him to somebody, with the result that he might have lost a job in that store if he had happened to have one. I once was in a store myself without a hat. I had worn one in, but a salesman had taken it away to put a new band on it, which my wife declared it needed. Personally, I thought the old band was all right, but we had compromised on a new one. A man came in and asked me for a hat suitable to wear at the seashore. I almost had him sold on a handsome high silk topper when the salesman came back and ruined everything.

In the Grand Central terminal, the other day, I happened to overhear a couple of Vermonters complaining of the low prices brought by farm products. "Milk!" exclaimed one bitterly. "Why milk is so cheap it doesn't pay to work the pump."

Bruce Barton has been telling me about the interesting things which may be seen in the patent office at Washington, a place I never have visited. He said that there was a model there of the swivel chair, such as used to be seen in all lawyers' offices and if I remember correctly he told me the patent on it had first been taken out by Thomas Jefferson. Non refillable bottles appear to be the inventions on which most patents have been granted. I believe that one patent actually was granted on a perpetual motion machine.

The new West side viaduct certainly has speeded up traffic between Twenty-third street and the Battery and as soon as this is hitched up with the speedway they have been building along the edge of the Hudson, the result should be a real help to midtown congestion, as all through traffic undoubtedly will take the new route.

The "Tans" are the newest breed, and they can be obtained in two colors. The under color is always yellow, but the top color varies.

About Chile

Bathing Beach at Valparaiso.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

THE recent forced retirement of a president of Chile throws emphasis on some of the unusual features of the Chilean constitution and government.

The old Chilean constitution existed from 1833 until 1925 and was the oldest constitution of a republic in the western hemisphere except that of the United States. It was an intimate mixture of the governmental principles of the United States and those of Europe. While it was not designed with such an idea in view, developments seemed to be steering Chile toward a real parliamentary system.

Then came the new constitution of 1925 which modified this trend. Under the Chilean constitution of 1925 the American system of three separate functions—executive, legislative and judicial—was adopted; but unlike the United States, Chile incorporated a system of federal centralization which was probably more extreme than in any other republic. This president appoints the sixteen intendentes, who correspond roughly to our governors. With the intendentes nominating them, he also appoints the sixty-five governors who rule over regions such as might be formed by groups of counties in the United States, and the alcaldes of municipalities with more than 10,000 population. The governors appoint subdelegates to administer the smaller municipalities roughly corresponding to townships, and the subdelegates in turn appoint inspectors for small precincts. The whole elaborate civil hierarchy centers in the president and is ruled from the national capital.

Direct Election Adopted.

The constitution of 1925 provided for the indirect election of the president for five years through a sort of electoral college; the indirect election of senators in the provinces for six-year terms; and the direct election of members of the lower house from the districts. This has all been changed. The president is now directly elected for six years, but is ineligible for re-election. The forty-five senators are elected by direct vote in their groups of provinces, for terms of eight years, with half the seats newly filled every four years. The deputies of the lower house are also elected by direct popular votes in their departments or groups of departments. As in the United States, a cabinet is appointed by the president and is responsible to him.

The old constitution established the Roman Catholic church and prohibited other forms of public worship. The new constitution separated the church and state and did away with property qualifications for voters. All citizens over twenty years of age who can read and write and who registers, may vote.

An unusual feature of the Chilean government is its tribunal calificador which must pass on the validity of all elections of president, senators and deputies. It consists of five members chosen by lot, one chosen from past presidents and vice presidents of the senate; one from past presidents and vice presidents of the lower chamber; two from ministers of the Supreme court, and one from the ministers of the Court of Appeals of the city where congress meets.

Chile may be superficially compared to California with directions reversed. It stretches in a narrow strip with the Pacific on one side and a mountain range on the other and embraces dry desert, a productive temperate region, and an area of moisture and cold. Whereas California is only 800 miles long, however, Chile is 2,700 miles in length.

Great Ethnic Differences.

Chile differs as much ethnically from the rest of South America as it does politically. It has had a greater proportion of northern European immigration than its sister states, largely German and British. The predominant strain is a mixture of Spanish and Araucanian Indian, a mingling which extends through all social levels. Few immigrants from southern Europe have come in, and like Great Britain, Chile has working classes of its own blood.

The vast beds of sodium nitrate discovered in what is now northern Chile more than 100 years ago have meant much to the country economically during the last half century. But the perfection of processes in Europe to extract nitrogen electrically from the air, and the growth of ammonia products from coal distillation has greatly reduced the preferred position that Chile long held.

First opened up in 1880 when the region was under Peruvian and Bolivian ownership, the mining operations did not reach a great magnitude until after Chile annexed the territory in 1880. After that the world's demand for nitrates grew so great that by 1913 Chile was exporting between two and three million tons. The World War increased the demand, for nitrate is the chief raw material for explosives as well as for wheat and cotton growing; and Chile's desert deposits kept the guns of the allies booming.

If one would get a quick conception of the importance, the lovely surroundings, and the climate of Santiago, Chile's capital, he should set San Francisco or Los Angeles down in the most beautiful inland portion of the Valley of California, give the Sierra Nevada 4,000 feet more height and pile on them more generous caps of snow.

Santiago, with its nearly three-quarters of a million population, is fairly comparable in size to Pittsburgh and Boston. Among the Spanish cities of the world only Madrid and Barcelona in the Old world, and Buenos Aires and Mexico City in the new, exceed it. But it is not on size that admirers of Santiago base their eulogies. The city, like our own capital, has a subtle charm all its own. Much of this is due to its location. Many travelers agree that it has the most beautiful and inspiring setting of all the great inland cities of the world. It is situated near the upper end of a mountain-rimmed valley, 40 miles long by 20 wide. Ten miles to the east the Andes rise to heights greater than 18,000 feet, presenting a towering wall always snow-capped. On the west is a lower coast range; and to the south stretches a level expanse of fertile farming land divided into large estates.

Park of Santa Lucia.

Santiago is built on the plain, but within it rises a 400-foot hill, covering several hundred acres, which has been made into one of the world's unique parks. Once nearly bare, the hill of Santa Lucia has been transformed into an enchanting modern hanging garden of groves and flower beds, winding roads and trails, cascades, terraces, sylvan theaters and observation kiosks. From its slopes one may obtain numerous charming vistas, and from its top Santiago lies spread out in all its lovely details.

It is a city predominantly of low, flat-roofed buildings, for the hand of Spain lies heavy upon it in all matters of habit and custom. But for all that the old Spanish life has taken on a briskness that must be bred of the West. There is a movement and bustle that modifies much of the inertia of Old Spain, and which at the same time stamps Santiago unmistakably a metropolis.

The axis of life in Santiago is the beautiful Alameda de las Delicias, which cleaves the city in two. Its great breadth of 350 feet is divided by four rows of stately trees. Down the center is the Paseo, a broad promenade, lined by many flower beds and statue-studded little parks, along which innumerable nursemaids herd their romping charges. On either side of the Paseo are the tracks of the electric street railway, and farther outside are broader driveways. The Alameda is lined with many of the finest residences and public buildings of the capital.

The lover of fresh air comes into his own in Santiago's delightful climate. Great crowds of people are on the Paseo and in the plazas each evening. Most of the dwellings are of the Spanish type with open courts in the center, in which much of the family's time is spent. The street cars are double-deckers, with the upper seats open. Those who wish to climb the steps and enjoy the air and view pay a smaller fee than the passengers who ride on the lower level.

Few great cities are so fortunate as Santiago in regard to their water supplies. Sparklingly pure cold water from the high Andes is available in abundance within a few miles. The city could grow to a community of many millions without being faced with any great difficulty about this necessary for which some municipalities have had to reach out hundreds of miles. Through the city runs the Mapocho river whose floods were once a source of danger. Chilean engineers have tamed the river, however, confining it within a concrete channel, and it is now harmless.

CHEESE IN FAVOR THE WORLD OVER

Probably Oldest Food in Universal Use.

With the possible exception of butter, cheese is the oldest prepared food in the world. It is meat to the French, potatoes to the Dutch, breakfast, dinner, and supper to the Swiss. In Paris every restaurant worthy of its name has a cheese cellar. The French chef would be as lost without eggs—cheese creeps into his delicacies at every turn.

In Alkmaar, cheeses are auctioned off every Friday. On the day before, wagons and boats laden with cannon-ball cheeses come to town from every direction. The auction begins at ten o'clock sharp. The bidding starts to the strains of Loheggin's wedding march played on a wonderful old carillon. At some of these auctions, 125,000 little Edams are sold in a single day.

Today there are 500 varieties of cheese—all made of milk but all treated differently. The variations in cheeses are often due to locality, breed of cows, and atmospheric conditions. Many of these cheeses which originated in foreign countries are produced under laboratory conditions in the United States today. Roquefort cheese is an example; it has been made for 500 years in Roquefort, France. Excellent Roquefort cheese is manufactured in America at the present time.

In all times and all ages food-stuffs have acquired a host of traditions, some true and others violently erroneous. Cheese enjoys no exception to this rule. Some people pronounce it "rich" and say that only small amounts should be eaten at any time. Other traditions have grown up about the time and way it should be eaten. The most absurd of these wars against the use of cheese at the evening meal because it supposedly causes bad dreams.

There is no need to trust to tradition in this matter, according to nutritionists of the National Dairy Council. Exhaustive studies undertaken by the United States Department of Agriculture have revealed the truth, so that anyone who wishes can use cheese to his own best good. Tests reveal that cheese is from 90 per cent to 99 per cent digestible.

The Election Bet

Former Mayor Thompson was talking to a Chicago reporter about the city's empty treasury.

"It's unique," he said. "The rich city of Chicago is in as queer a fix as the chap in the hat."

"A chap in a hat," after he'd tried on nearly every hat in the place, said he wanted a finer, softer quality of felt.

"But this line," the latter said, "is really very superior, sir. You really can't do better than this."

"The chap examined the hat again. 'No,' he said, 'it's not tender enough. You see, I've got to eat it.'"

This Machine Age

Studies of how machinery causes unemployment by replacing man power have been made from time to time during the past fifty years. The latest study of this kind, made for Collier's Weekly, reveals a razor-blade machine which takes the place of 500 men, and a railroad switching device which supersedes 108 men. Machines have now displaced 9 out of 10 shoe workers, it is shown.

Nut Trees in Variety

In Baldwin, L. I., on the main business street within 500 feet of the railroad station is the largest collection of nut trees in the country, and for that matter, in the world. Not the largest in area, for it covers less than seven acres, but in its confines are more varieties of nut trees than are to be found elsewhere.

VOCABULARY INDEX TO MENTAL ABILITY

Vocabulary is a fairly reliable index to a person's mental ability, states Calvin T. Ryan in an article "Speech Habits and Personality," in Hygeia Magazine. A man's language is considered the shaper of his thoughts and no longer as a mere conveyance of thought, he declares. Precocious children who learn to talk before the normal age have been found to have abnormally large vocabularies and to be above the average in intelligence, Mr. Ryan writes. The children who begin to talk later than the normal period have been found to have small vocabularies for any certain age and to be below the average in intelligence.

We are called a lip-lazy people, says Mr. Ryan. We are told that we do not love our language. Boys and girls graduate from high school, go into college and professional school without learning to speak grammatically. They have never been taught the seriousness of speech habits, and they do not realize that a slovenly speaker is a slovenly thinker.

Thanks to our modern science, mental and physical, we are now able to recognize the cause and effect of speech abnormalities and to do something for most of them. Speech clinics are becoming almost as popular as baby clinics were 25 years ago and ways have been found to remedy stammering, stuttering and organic malformations of the organs of speech.

Parents and relatives of young children who set a bad example by incorrect speech are deplored by Mr. Ryan. For the normal child, learning to talk is not only a great event but a great task. If he is normal and acquires habits that are abnormal, the result is nothing short of a disaster.

A public benefactor must not be too sensitive. The mean will question his motives.

Looking to Alaska for Supply of Pencil Wood

The pencil wood supply near large factories is practically exhausted and the industry is now investigating the possibility of utilizing Alaska red cedar, the finest-grained wood of the Northwest. Cedar wood intended for lead pencils must be soft, light yet strong, close and straight-grained and free from defects. The older the tree the better pencil wood it makes. The wood "from the heart of aged logs that have lain in the deep woods for years makes admirable pencil material. A possible substitute for cedar in lead pencils is Pacific coast myrtle. Its wood is light, straight-grained, well-scented and of good color. Both cedar and myrtle woods are immune to the effects of quick climate changes.

Synthetic Sunlight

Experiments in London by the National Physical Laboratory have shown that artificial sunlight, shining through imitation windows to further approximate the effect of real daylight, will speed up the production of night workers. The eyes are more comfortable under conditions as nearly approaching natural daylight as possible and better vision produces better work. In the experiments coloring of the light to approximate the sun's rays was found to be of paramount importance.

A CAFETERIA FOR LAYING HENS

(By Prof. Paul G. Riley)

In a number of sections all over the country we find a few poultrymen who have been inclined to do a little home experimenting or testing of various methods of feeding. One thing they have tried is to put a hopper of grain and a hopper of mash in front of their laying flock and feed them in this way the year 'round. This method of feeding sounds interesting to the lazy man, because it decidedly reduces labor and takes less skill on the part of the feeder.

At the University of Kentucky the writer saw some hens which had been fed in this "cafeteria" fashion, and the production from both Leghorns and heavy breeds was very satisfactory and indicates that the practice has some possibilities.

In connection with the method of feeding observed there, good dry mash was kept in hoppers in front of the birds, and grain was fed in the same manner.

This practice has possibilities with Leghorns and other light breeds which are bred for high production, and also with heavy producing strains of the heavy breeds. However, it is doubtful whether it is desirable for farm flocks or for birds of the heavy breeds which are not particularly bred for high production, because it is likely that they will put on excessive weight and not give maximum production. It is also likely that hand-feeding small amounts of grain during cold weather in the winter and damp, chilly weather in the fall and spring is advisable, and certainly the caretaker should stir both the mash and grain two or three times daily in order to increase consumption.

BOYS MAKE TRIP TO ALABAMA

About two miles from where Floyd Collins was trapped and died, and about twenty miles from Mammoth Cave.

Friday's main attention was to keep dry as it rained most of the day, yet we wound our way thru the other half of Kentucky to Nashville, Tenn., where the "cops" must have stolen the traffic lights and left town. "Imagine seeing no officers or signals in the heart of a capital city on market day." One will find his brakes a very necessary thing in Nashville. Making a successful exit we proceeded on seeing many roadside stands and yard fences adorned with fancy hand made baskets, rugs and quilts. Night came on us near Decatur, Ala., with a front connecting rod knocked out. Here we got a room as it was unfit to camp. Next morning (Saturday) we repaired the motor and by nine o'clock were on our way again.

By this time we were leaving the tobacco behind and beginning to enter the cotton belt. All of north central Alabama was hard hit both last year and this by drouth. Crops and stock in bad shape. 2:30 P. M. brought us to Birmingham. Here was the first real test for the car. About four miles in second gear thru the main part of town. About a mile farther up we could look across town and see where we had been about eight miles back but less than two miles away. This mountain territory only lasted for about thirty miles, then it began to be less steep and winding for the balance of the trip. Saturday night was spent at Clanton, Ala. Sunday we were to see the end of the trail about 3:00 P. M. We were being expected and a big chicken dinner was soon prepared.

Four days soon passed, during which time our friend, Charlie proceeded to see what was to be seen, enjoy a good swim in the Choctawhatchee River, pick some cotton and see how it was ginned and baled, and learn the names of some things he had not seen before. Friday morning was spent collecting souvenirs to bring back and to get on our way. We came back thru Georgia to Atlanta, passing by the Federal penitentiary and camping Saturday night at Stone Mountain. Here we viewed the mountain from three sides and on top.

Sunday we passed thru Athens, Ga. to Anderson, S. C., where we visited with a friend for a few hours and spending the night at Williamston, S. C. Monday, seen us in the height of our glory and the height of the mountains. We were in Asheville "The Land of the Sky" about noon. Shortly after we crossed the line into Tennessee just north of the "Great Smoky Mountains" with their peaks rising well over 6,000 feet. Thru this region we took a number of snap-shots and made camp Monday night at Morristown, Tenn. Here, at a high altitude was plenty of fresh air fragrant with pine and cedars. An extra blanket was desirable before morning.

Tuesday brought us into the Cumberland Mountains, crossing at Cumberland Gap, Tenn. Almost before we left town we were in Virginia, climbing steeply up Pinnacle Mountain. On the first road we had climbed we could look nearly straight down into Tennessee and ahead of us into Kentucky. From here we vary down thru the heart of the Blue Grass where poor stock is unknown and beautiful farm homes are plentiful. One thing that will always attract attention is their contrivance to open and close their gates without having to dismount or get out of their car. These were a very common sight all the rest of the way to Newport. Here we again crossed the Ohio River into Cincinnati, Ohio. We had been dreading Cincinnati with all its traffic and were surprised to find that our route was a wide boulevard around the edge of town and could drive most as fast as we pleased.

Coining on up Route U. S. 27 we were soon back in Indiana. We came thru Richmond, Winchester, Portland and Gene Stratton Porter's home town of Geneva near Limerlost Swamp to Fort Wayne and home with a full head of steam but not 'regusted.' Our total expense for the round trip of about 2,100 miles and fifteen days was less than $50.00.

DUAL BANK SYSTEM FAVORED BY BANKER

State and National Institutions Supplement Each Other in Serving Country's Varied Financial Needs

RECENT suggestions that all banks in the United States be under Federal jurisdiction, doing away with the chartering of banks by the various states recalls the opposition to this plan presented at the recent convention of the American Bankers Association by R. S. Hecht of New Orleans, Chairman of its Economic Policy Commission. Mr. Hecht said:

"There are just as good reasons why there should be state as well as national banks, as that there should be state as well as a national government. I do not think that analogy is far-fetched. The states should not surrender all political jurisdiction to the central government, and the local business life of the states should not be made to surrender all control over financial functions to national financial instrumentalities. There are many variations of business conditions from state to state and there are special financial requirements of the various states.

"It is entirely logical, therefore, that the states should retain the right to charter banks so as to mold and direct their affairs in accordance with the states' governmental and business requirements and keep them adapted to localized sentiment and conditions.

"The argument is sometimes advanced that the dual system jeopardizes the life of the Federal Reserve System because under it there is a large group of banks that are free to remain out of or to withdraw from the system. Facts and figures prove that this is a specious argument. "It is true that there has been some shifting from national to state charters especially in cases of mergers of large national banks with banks operating under state charters. However, the Federal Reserve System was not weakened in this process because the merged institutions almost universally retained their membership in the system on a voluntary basis. Moreover, the records show that state bank members are just as good members of the system as national banks and the ratio of state bank resources in the Federal Reserve System is constantly growing. In 1922, national banks held about 65 per cent of the resources of reserve members, and state banks about 35 per cent, while in 1928, the nationals held only 60 per cent and state banks 40 per cent.

Banking Systems Help Each Other

"Reciprocally the state and national banks systems have helped each other. If the national banking law had served in some respects as something of a model code toward which state banking laws more and more have approached year by year, so have the state codes developed valuable reforms which have suggested improvements for the national laws. A great many undesirable competitive inequalities have been wiped out by this mutual evolutionary process and farther progress along the line of uniformity so far as is desirable is anticipated.

"However, I do not believe that it is a disadvantage to have two banking codes that differ in some respects. It is quite probable that the state banking code in many instances represents a closer adjustment to local conditions than could be had under the national banking laws, and this is a situation that should be retained. There should, however, not be competition between the two banking codes. Competition should be between banks themselves and not between the laws under which they operate. The effort to offer too great allurements in one code as against the other could lead only to weak banking laws. But I do think that there should be the alternative opportunities that now exist which banking institutions and local business interests may choose, so that they can function or conduct their business relationships under that banking code which best meets the conditions of the times and of the place as they see them. "This has been illustrated in both directions. In states where such sound measures as the guarantee of deposits were operative state banks had the opportunity to escape the baleful effect of such laws. On the other hand, when a court decision was handed down in Worcester, Massachusetts, which rendered uncertain the position of trust assets acquired by a national bank through a merger with a state bank, it was a real advantage for national banks affected to take out and operate under a state charter, either on a temporary or a permanent basis, as circumstances make expedient.

"In my opinion, bankers, national as well as state, should combat the thought that conceives of depriving the vitalizing benefits of our dual system."

Finance Fights Erosion

Farm terracing to stop erosion is of major importance in Noble County, Oklahoma, the county agent said, and so one of the county's national banks bought five farm levels to be loaned to farmers without charge. The machines were immediately put to use and the farmers are showing keen interest in terracing. Two terracing schools were started for adults and 4-H Club boys.

CUT OF $35,000 FROM BUDGET IS MADE BY COUNTY

Tax Rate Cent Less Than For 1931

The determination of the DeKalb county council to cut appropriations for 1932 to the bone was carried out. The budget was reduced more than $35,000 and the proposed rate of 56 cents on the $100 valuation was cut to 43 cents. The 1931 rate was 49 cents.

It was probably one of the most difficult sessions in the history of the council. All seven members were on duty Tuesday morning for the opening of the final vote was not taken until after midnight Wednesday.

The council found it necessary to raise the county fund levy from 25 cents, the rate for 1931, to 29 cents, chiefly because of the general election next year and the new law giving the prosecuting attorney a straight salary instead of fees. Because of new paving of county roads, the rate for the payment of bonds and interest was necessarily raised from 10 cents to 14 cents. However, the 14 cent rate for gravel road repair was slashed to 5 cents.

The budget as advertised called for $130,585 to be raised by taxation for the county fund, but this was cut $18,248 by the council, the amount allowed being $112,337. E. E. Turner, county highway superintendent, had trimmed his budget $13,000 as compared with the current year, but the council cut off $17,000 more. The amount to be raised by taxation is $23,950. To this will be added about $30,000 from gasoline tax, making a total income for the year of $53,950, as compared with $37,000 this year.

Conspicuous among the reductions in the budget is that of $4,950 for the county surveyor's office. The salary of the surveyor or was cut from $3,300 to $2,800; for deputies, from $2,100 to $1,000; for other employees, from $1,500 to $800; and all other operating expense, from $1,965 to $1,015. An item of $1,800 for salary of assistants was taken out entirely by the council.

Less for Employees

The council allowed nothing for salary-for assistant to the county highway superintendent or assistant to the county agent. The amount asked was $500 in each case. The salary of court reporter was cut from $1,700 to $1,600 and that of the probation officer from $1,200 to $1,100. The salary of the court house custodian and engineer was reduced from $1,800 to $1,620; that of the janitors from $2,460 to $1,800; that of the firemen from $1,000 to $700; and that of the matron from $540 to $480. The allowances for the sheriff were reduced $1,035. The salary of the deputy was made $600 instead of $1,200 as sought in the budget. The item for operating expenses for the county jail was cut from $1,920 to $1,470.

The salary of the county infirmary matron was reduced from $750 to $500; that of the infirmary physician from $200 to $150; the wages of other infirmary employees, from $1,820 to $1,700; and other operating expenses of the infirmary, from $5,170 to $4,235. The salary of the attorney for the poor was made $57 instead of $100.

The councilmen expressed the opinion that no new roads nor new ditches should be petitioned for very soon. The item of $1,000 for the expense of ditches in the commissioner's court was cut to $600. An appropriation of $5,000 was made for new bridges and $4,000 for bridge repairs. The council believed this is the minimum that could be granted for bridges.

Conspicuous among the special appropriations allowed for 1931 is one of $8,310.49 as an installment of one-fourth of the cost of paving state road 27 south of Garrett. One similar payment had been made previously, about two years ago.

The council granted $10,000 additional for poor relief this year and a like amount for next year.

Know Men

There are men who, with clear perceptions, as they think, of their own duty, do not see how too eager a pursuit of one duty may involve them in the violation of others, or how too warm an embracement of one truth may lead to a disregard of other truths equally important. —Daniel Webster.

FUNDS FOR HOMES SUPPLIED BY BANKS

By ROME C. STEPHENSON

President American Bankers Association

A LARGE portion of the funds required in home building always has been furnished by banks.

They have shown constantly a deep interest in the performance of this feature of national development.

Upon it rests much of our country's future stability, and any contribution to its advancement redounds to the advantage of all.

So banking has never permitted its co-operative attitude toward home building to lessen.

Practically all banks now accept savings deposits which can well be turned to the advantage of the home builders.

The construction of individual dwellings requires a large amount of financing and is a thoroughly commendable enterprise.

Necessarily, the aid given to home builders is governed by the sound banking rules which have grown out of the years of experience and the constant studies of bank practices.

All of the efforts made to secure broader real estate loan privileges, to adjust resources to make it possible to lend larger sums for long terms, the standardization of mortgage loan formulas, and the actual lending of vast sums on mortgage notes evidence the desire of banks to contribute a full measure of support to the home-building movement.

This is true of all classes of banks, but even in a more marked degree of those whose deposits are largely in the form of savings and whose loans are primarily for building or home purchasing purposes.

Both Sides Protected

The process through which bank loans are made on real estate is as simple as the nature of such an important transaction will permit.

When money is advanced the lender must know that repayment will be made the specified time. Likewise the borrower wants to be assured that, after he has figured the loan on the basis of his conservatively anticipated ability to pay, he will not be required to do more, that he will not be disturbed in his efforts to work out of his obligations under those terms.

Whether his agreement is to repay the loan in three or five years, or on a monthly or yearly basis, he wants the assurance that no additional burdens will be imposed upon him. All of this is settled definitely in advance.

There is no mystery about any of the details, and when the negotiations are complete the borrower knows just what he may expect and what he will be required to do to meet his obligations.

Loans made to persons who wish to acquire homes are not necessarily building loans. One may wish to purchase a home already constructed.

In this form of transaction bank loans are used very freely because it is the only kind of a real estate loan some classes of banks may make. Others of course, may lend upon real estate with improvements uncompleted and advance funds as the construction progresses.

Different styles in home financing have developed in the various states, and banks have tried to adapt their facilities to the needs. Whatever character of assistance is required in any particular instance usually can be found in some bank in the local community.

Among banks and borrowers for home acquisition purposes a long established and thoroughly tested relationship exists. Banks are not the only agencies through which such funds are available; they do not embody all the spirit of helpfulness which abounds.

However, through the years of their co-operation their aid has been of unquestioned value to the home builders whose efforts to establish a permanence for themselves have received constant encouragement. Bankers everywhere are ready to counsel with their customers about their home-building plans and to assist to the extent of their ability.

This is being done constantly and the many advantages of it are not without recognition.

THE INDIVIDUAL AND HIS BANK

By ROME C. STEPHENSON

President American Bankers Association

BANKERS recognize that their business carries especially heavy public responsibilities and welcome all sound measures to aid them meet the duties this imposes.

Unceasing efforts to bring about continually improving methods to safeguard depositors in banks of all kinds have long been uppermost in the plans of bankers' organizations throughout the nation.

They are not the outgrowth merely of the past year of business adversity, but have been carried on actively for many years and have resulted in great progress along lines of better, safer banking methods.

Although banking along with all business has suffered reverses, conditions in this field have been far less severe than they would have been had not bankers been widely successful in their endeavors to develop the high standards of banking that now generally prevail.

The American Bankers Association and bankers' organizations in every state actively support the principle of government supervision of banking.

The national banks, which receive their charters to do business from the federal government, are under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency at Washington. Through his efficient staffs of expert bank examiners in every section he has the duty and powers to keep watch of the way every national bank is being conducted, to suggest desirable changes in its policies or methods and even to step in and take control for the protection of the depositors if such action is warranted.

The state banks, also, which are chartered by the various state governments, are subject to similar supervision and control by state bank officials. In addition banks in many places have long maintained voluntary clearing house associations which enforce even closer supervision over their members.

Bankers Favor Public Supervision

Present laws adequately enforced contain ample provisions for government supervision. Bankers universally believe in strong, capable banking departments manned by officials with the discretion and courage to enforce these laws and act under them as the common welfare demands. They believe that these public officials should be paid sufficient salaries to command the services of men of character, ability and a resolute spirit of public service.

They believe also that the banking departments should be kept free from all political or other special influence in order to be able to act at all times with single-minded independence solely for the benefit of the public interest.

Although banks in the United States operating under state or national charters are thus subject to supervision of public authority, they are strictly private business enterprises. They are owned by their stockholders and administered by officials chosen through the boards of directors which their stockholders elect. No bank is owned or operated by the United States Government, nor, with one small exception in a western state, by any state government.

The function of government supervision in banking is to promote and enforce careful banking administration through the system of examination and supervision which I have described. This, however, does not relieve the individual depositor from the necessity of judging and choosing carefully as to his banking relations, just as in his other business or professional relations. He must inquire for himself into the character and type of institution and men he shall do business with, satisfying himself as to their reputation, reliability and capability. These qualities are essential to complete the element of safety and dependability in any human institution.

An Illusory Law

The bank deposit guaranty law in any form is a snare and a delusion, declares a banker in a state where it has been tried, adding: "It is a license and encouragement to irresponsible banks and banking and penalizes capital solvency and prudent banking. It creates a sense of security in the minds of the unthinking and uninformed that is false and impossible to be realized ultimately. To compare it to legitimate insurance is without reason and absurd. It jeopardizes the solvency of all banks and the safety of all depositors for the theoretical safety of a few. Guaranty schemes always have been, are and always will be impotent, futile and disastrous. It is not new. Has been tried, failed and discarded at intervals for more than 100 years in this country. No well-informed, honest and intelligent mind can accept it in principle or practice. Competent bank supervision and restriction of bank territory that will warrant sufficient capital investment and accounts is the only sane and honest course and will afford all the guaranty the depositing public is entitled to as compared with all other human affairs."

Son Is Accused of Father's Murder

Arrested While Escorting Body to Burial Place.

Kansas City.—Bartholomew J. Scannell, thirty-three, was walking toward the baggage car in which the body of his sixty-three-year-old father had been transported from Florida to be buried here beside his mother, when two city detectives arrested him for the murder of his father.

"You are under arrest," the officers told him.

"Why?" Scannell queried.

"On request of the sheriff of Jacksonville, Fla., we were asked to hold you in connection with your father's death," O. A. Lindsey, one of the detectives, answered, while G. A. Carter, his partner was putting handcuffs on Scannell.

Father Found Murdered.

Scannell's father, John F. Scannell, a poultry farmer living on a six-acre farm near Dismore, Fla., eleven miles north of Jacksonville, was found murdered five days before.

Apparently the crime had been committed two days before the body was found in a small shed. An ax had been used by the killer. Sheriff W. H. Calhoun claims to have an eye-witness of the slaying.

Protesting he knew nothing about the death of his father until he was notified at Tampa, Fla., young Scannell requested permission to have the plans for the funeral carried out.

Scannell said that he would return

THE POSITION OF AGNES WINTERS

By Fannie Hurst

(Copyright, 1931, McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

A CHILD named Ellen, sixteen years of age, with hair in a yellow braid over each shoulder, and a faded blue frock that bespoke poverty, regarded her mother with eyes dilated in appalled amazement as her parent quivering with rage stood beside a small mean table in a small mean room and boomed "No!"

That "No" had deeply rooted beginnings. It was a "No" that went back and back into the recesses of memory.

It was a "No" addressed to Mrs. James McRae.

The mother of the girl in the torn blue frock, Agnes Winters, had worked in the McRae household as a domestic servant for a period of thirty years. There were dark-blue glasses across the eyes of Agnes Winters, but they did not prevent her from looking inward toward those aisles of time.

The McRae's was a big household. A forty-room affair with five acres of rose gardens. Garage for ten cars. Gardeners' cottages, and a house-staff of some fifteen servants.

The position of Agnes Winters in that household was a dual one of chambermaid and personal maid to Mrs. McRae. There was a French girl who officially occupied the latter capacity, but Agnes did the mending and the fine handwork, and the embroidery of initials on Mrs. McRae's sheer lingerie and handkerchiefs.

The mother of Agnes Winters had worked for the mother of Alice McRae in almost the same capacity. It was sort of a dynasty. The Winters serving the McRaes.

Alice McRae conducted her household with a high, efficient hand. She was accustomed to money, always had been, and with the manner-born of one wealthy enough to dare to scribble, she conducted the great establishment along in a sort of business-like lines. There was no waste in the McRae household. The servants were given good and sufficient food, but food of a different grade than that of the household. Their quarters were warmed in winter, but to a lower temperature than the house proper. Many a night Agnes Winters had sat in her small room with its slanting roof, her feet wrapped in her coat and a candle lighted on the table for the warmth it gave off.

The servants on the McRae estate remained for two reasons. Wages were high, comparatively speaking, and their children were permitted to attend, free of charge, the great McRae schools which were conducted on an endowment fund contributed by an ancestral McRae.

Agnes' mother had remained in the McRae service until her death for that reason. After her death, Agnes, in a sort of dull apathy, also continued on. She was valuable to Mrs. McRae, who had discovered in her a talent for the most minute and lovely hand-embroidery. For years, ever since Agnes had been fifteen and out of the McRae school, Alice McRae had worn lingerie that was the delight and admiration of her women friends. Even the McRae table linen, napkins, tea cloths, dollies were the subject of comment.

"Museum pieces!" exclaimed the guests, eyeing through longnettes the indescribably minute handwork of Agnes.

If she had had the initiative or aggressiveness, Agnes, as she had so often been told by her associates, could have made large sums of money at her art-embroidery.

But Agnes detested the work. The process of picking with a splinter of needle, through a mesh of linen or silk, was maddening to her nerves. Needle-work tortured her body and more than that, it tortured her eyes, sending her to bed night after night with blinding, torturous headaches.

Against these headaches, Mrs. McRae supplied spectacles, ground out from a prescription written by a local dealer in opera glasses and binoculars. They relieved, but did not cure.

And so, on and on through the years, Agnes Winters, protesting occasionally, but in the main resigned, continued to create for Mrs. McRae the beautiful and the sheer in handwork.

When she was twenty she married one of the gardeners, Morris Murphy, and had learned his trade from an American who had taken him to Italy. He was a bluff, good-humored fellow and as if by contrast, seemed to admire in Agnes Winters the demure, quiet qualities that were so removed from his own.

They were married and continued as man and wife to live on, in service, at the McRae's.

It became, after a while, terrible to Morris Murphy to see the kind of degradation to which Agnes was subjected by the insistent demands of Mrs. McRae for more and more fine needle-work. He had never realized up to then the cruel-kind of pressure under which this quiet young girl had spent her youth. Her eyes were so tired. When she lifted her face to kiss him it was as if they were filled with little dagger points. Crucified with little steel splinters.

It was the end of the third year of their marriage, six months before their child Ellen was born, that one night, seated in their small room, Morris drawing plans for a new garden pergola for Mrs. McRae, and Agnes seated as usual over a complicated embroidery frame, that she cried out sharply and clutched with her hands across her eyes.

The horrible had happened. Agnes had practically lost her sight.

And so it happened that a child, Ellen, was to come into a world and never know her mother as except a two-thirds blind woman, who groped her way about the little household and had the pathetic habit of forever rubbing her hand across her eyes as if to tear away a film.

Another strange thing in the life of the little Ellen was the fact that the quiet little body, given to simple indoor pleasures could arouse within her parent an unreasonable amount of anger, if she so much as attempted to pick up a needle to make doll clothes, which delighted her as a pastime. The gentle mother of little Ellen became a virgo then. It was one of the things she early learned she dared not do.

When Ellen was fifteen years old, Morris Murphy, genial, good-humored, good-natured, good husband, good parent, fell off the top of a high and elaborate pergola he was building for Mrs. McRae and was instantly killed.

Overnight, as it were, the kindest light in the meager life of Agnes and Ellen went out.

And into the midst of this darkness there strode one day, commiserating, kindly in her efficient manner, the figure of Mrs. McRae, for whom Agnes had gone two-thirds blind and for whom Morris had hurried to his death.

It was then that Ellen, as Mrs. McRae came on her benign mission of offering to take the little Ellen into her household as maid, beheld her mother draw herself up to the height of fury and order the cowed figure of Mrs. McRae out of the gardener's cottage.

Inventive Minds Never at Loss for Subjects

In spite of the many shows that lay claim to being the greatest on earth, no exposition or entertainment had the same right to this distinction that the international patent show in Chicago had. Here were collected the models of all manner of inventions. And invention is the profession, the avocation or the hobby of perhaps three-quarters of all Americans and of at least a good half of mankind in the lump.

The fertility of mind, the ingenuity and the manual skill represented in the Chicago exhibit are probably staggering. Even when the creations have no real use, even when they prove in actual, full-scale practice to be failures, even when they at once sink into obscurity, these inventions are things to tease our curiosity and excite our admiration. Consider merely the things mentioned in the news stories—a nonabsorbent powder puff, a special sort of suspender buckle, an improved form of rubber heel, a new type of helicopter, nonskid soap, a piano that sounds like forty instruments, a noiseless car wheel. What dogged patience and fanatical enthusiasm gave them birth what labor and what mad hope!

The urge to add something to the stock of reality to create something profoundly simple, useful and valuable is one of the most basic and powerful urges. One has only to look at present-day civilization and just begin the everlasting catalogue of "artificialities" and "jobs" to appreciate what has been produced. Yet these are only the successful inventions, the marketable and salable ones, a tiny fraction of the machines, devices, patterns and designs that have been studied, devised and put forth with unshakable belief in their virtue. Even among those who do not attempt actually to invent, the desire to be identified with such work crops up irresistibly.—Baltimore Sun.

Memory of the Maid

A visit to Orleans, in France, reveals the undying devotion France pays to her heroic. Centuries have passed since the little peasant girl, Jeanne d'Arc, at the battle of Orleans, delivered the French from the hands of the British and secured for the Dauphin Charles the throne of France, but her courageous deeds are still fresh in the memory of the people of Orleans. She was captured by the British in 1431 and burned at the stake, but as you look at her as she sits with her head and shoulders erect on her bronze stallion in the middle of the square the manner of her death is forgotten and her life remembered.

THE STORY

With his English wife, Catherine, and son, Jeems, Henry Bulain, French settler in Canada in 1765, cultivates a farm adjacent to the Tontoutt's. As the story opens the Bulains are returning from a visit to the Tontoutts. Catherine, who is a Quaker, meets them with presents for the family. To Jeems she gives a pistol, bidding him perfect himself in marksmanship. Heapsah, cousin of Tontoutt, fears for the safety of the Bulains in their isolated position. Jeems fights with Paul Tacha, cousin of Tontoutt. Next day Jeems calls at the Tontoutt home and apologizes for his behavior. The Tontoutts go to Quebec. Four years pass. War between Britain and France rages. Jeems returns from a hunt to find his home burned and his father and mother slain. He goes to the seigneurie and finds the manor destroyed and Tontoutt and his servants dead.

CHAPTER V—Continued

Against this clouthing of his senses he felt himself struggling as if swimming in an empty space. He picked up his hatchet and his bow and rose to his feet. He had not lost sound of the mill wheel even when Tontoutt's sobbing had seemed to be at his side. It was crying at him now, but before he turned toward it his eyes rested on Tontoutt's wooden peg. It was half cut off, a mark of grim humor on the part of a butcher. The mill wheel was forcing his attention to that fact. "Look—look—look!" it said, and then repeated the old song, calling him an English beast.

He faced it in a flash of resentment, not because of the wheel alone but on account of what lay at his feet and what he knew he would find nearer to the walls of the manor. His mind was hunting anathemas at the wheel. He wanted to tell it that it lied. In this hush of death he wanted to cry out that he was not the murderous breed who had sent the killers. Proof was over there, in the valley which at last was well named. His mother. His father. His Uncle Heapsah. Not one of them were dead by his hand. He had been left alive—by chance. That was proof. The wheel was wrong. It lied.

He looked at Tontoutt again, strengthening himself to go a little farther and find Tontoutt. He knew how it would be. Tontoutt's young body, even more pitiful than his mother's. He forced himself to turn toward the smoldering walls. Tontoutt—dead! His father might die, and Tontoutt, and all the rest of the world—but these two, his mother and Tontoutt, inseparable in his soul forever, the vital sparks which had kept his own heart beating—how could they die while he lived? He advanced, pausing over one of the slaves, a woman almost unclothed, inky black except the top of her head, which was red where her scalp was gone. In the crook of her arm was her sculptured infant. White, black, women, babies—the loveliness of girlhood—it made no difference.

Jeems scanned the earth beyond her, and where the smoke lay in a white shroud he saw a small, slim figure which he knew was Tontoutt. Another young body might have lain in the same way, its slenderness crumpled in the same manner, a naked arm revealed dimly under its winding sheet of smoke. But he knew this was Tontoutt. The dizzying haze wavered before his eyes again, and he put out his hand to hold it back. Tontoutt. Only a few steps from him. Dead, like his mother.

Old went ahead of him halfway to the still form and stopped. He sensed something Jeems could not see or feel through the smoke mist which undulated before their eyes. Warning of impending danger confronted the dog, and he tried to pass it to his master. In that moment, a shot came from the mill, and a flash of pain darted through Jeems' arm. He was flung backward and caught himself to hear echoes of the explosion beating against the forested hills and the wheel at the top of the mill screaming at him.

He answered the shot by dropping his bow and dashing toward the mill. Death might easily have met him at the threshold, but nothing moved in the vaultlike chamber he had entered, and there was no sound in it except that of his own breath and his racing heart. Odd went to the light of a new step which led to the tower room and told Jeems that what they sought was there. Jeems ran up, his hatchet raised to strike.

He must have been an unforgettable and terrifying object as he appeared above the floor into the light which forced its way through the dusty glass of three round windows over his head. There must have been a little of the monster about him. He had left some of his garments with his mother and father, and his arms and shoulders were bare. Char and smoke and the stain of earth had disfigured him. His face appeared to be painted for slaughter and a greenish fire glimmered in the eyes that were seeking for an enemy. Blood dripped to the oaken planks from his wounded arm. He was a Frankenstein ready to kill, dishevelment and fury concealing his youth, his stature made appalling by his eagerness to leap at something with the upraised hatchet.

If the hatchet had found a brain, it would have been Tontoutt's. She faced him as he came, holding the musket which she had fired through a slit in the wall as if she still possessed faith in its power to defend her. Her eyes had in them a touch of madness. Yet she was so straight and tense, waiting for death, that she did not seem to be wholly possessed by fear or terror. Something unconquerable was with her, the soul of Tontoutt himself struggling in her fragile breast to make her unafraid to die and giving to her an aspect of defiance. This courage could not hide the marks of her torture. Death had miraculously left her flesh untouched in passing, yet she stood crucified in the mill room.

Expecting a savage, she recognized Jeems. The musket fell from her hands to the floor with a dull crash, and she drew back as if retreating from one whose presence she dreaded more than that of a Mohawk, until her form pressed against the piled-up bags of grain, and she was like one at bay. The cry for vengeance which was on Jeems' lips broke in a sobbing breath when he saw her. He spoke her name, and Tontoutt made no response except that she drew herself more closely to the sacks. Odd's toenails clicked on the wooden floor as he went to her. This time he did not take her eyes from Jeems'. They were twin fires flaming at him through a twilight gloom. The dog touched her hand with his warm tongue, and she snatched it away.

She seemed to grow taller against the gray dusk of the wall of grain. "You—English—beast!"

It was not the mill wheel this time, but Tontoutt's voice, filled with the madness and passion which blazed from her eyes.

With a sudden movement she picked up the musket and struck at him. It had been loaded, she would have killed him. She continued to strike, but Jeems was conscious only of the words which came from her brokenly as she spent her strength on him. He had come with the English Indians to destroy her people! He and his mother had plotted it, and they were alive while every one who belonged to her was dead! The barrel of the gun struck him across the eyes. It fell against his wounded arm. It bruised his body. Sobbingly, she kept repeating that she wanted to kill him, and cried out wildly for the power with which to accomplish the act as he stood before her like a man of stone. An English beast—her people's murderer—a fiend more terrible than the painted savages.

She struck until the weight of the musket exhausted her and she dropped it. Then she matched weakly at the hatchet in Jeems' hands, and his fingers gave relaxed about the helve. With a cry of triumph, she raised it, but before the blow could descend she sank in a crumpled heap upon the floor. Even then her almost unconscious lips were whispering their denunciation.

He knelt beside her and supported her head in his unwounded arm. For a moment it lay against his breast. Her eyes were closed, her lips were still. And Jeems, sick from her blows, remembered his mother's God and breathed a prayer of gratitude because of her deliverance.

Then he bent and kissed the mouth that had cursed him.

CHAPTER VI

Tontoutt was alone when she awoke from the unconsciousness which had come to ease the anguish of her mind and body. It seemed to her she was coming out of sleep and that the walls which dimly met her eyes were those of her bedroom in the manor. That a truth whose evidence lay so horribly about her could be reality and not a dream broke on her senses dully at first and then with a swift understanding. She sat up expecting to see Jeems. But he was gone. She was no longer where she had fallen at her enemy's feet. But Jeems had made a resting place for her of empty bags and must have carried her to it. She shivered when she looked at the musket and the stain of blood on the floor. She had tried to kill him. And he had gone away, leaving her alive!

As had happened to Jeems, something was burned out of her now. It had gone in the sea of darkness which had swept over her, and she rose with an unemotional calmness, as if the tower room with its dust and cobwebs and store of rags and grain had become her cloister. Passion had worn itself away. If a thought could have slain, she would still have wreaked her vengeance on Jeems, but she would not have touched the musket again that lay on the floor.

She went to the head of the stairs and looked down. The son of the English woman had left no sign except the drip of blood that made a trail on the steps and out of the door. Exultation possessed her as she thought how nearly she had brought to the Bulains the same shadow of death which they and their kind had brought to her. The thought was gone in a moment, and she dropped fascinated, red, and dripping with blood, to the floor. The boy her mother had tried to make her regard with bitterness and dislike from childhood—a man grown into an English monster! She struggled to bring back her power to hate and her desire to kill, but the effort she made was futile. She followed the crimson stains.

All about her was the haze of smoke, soft and still in the air. In the distance, obscured by the fog which ran from the smoldering ruins, she saw a form bent grotesquely under a burden. It was a shapeless thing, distorted by the sun and the smoky spindrifts dancing before her eyes, but living because it was moving away from her. Behind it was a smaller object, and she knew the two were Jeems and Odd.

She watched until they were blotted from her vision, and minutes passed before she followed where they had gone.

Jeems must have seen her, for he reappeared with the dog like a were-wolf at his heels. He had found a coat somewhere but did not look so savage though his face was disfigured and bleeding where she had struck him with the barrel of the musket. She tried to speak when he stopped before her. Accusation and a bit of ferocity remained in her soul, but they were impotent in the silence between them. His eyes meeting hers steadily from under the lurid brand of her blow, seemed less like a murderer's and held more the gaze of one who regarded her with a cold and terrible pity. He did not put out a helping hand though she felt herself swaying. He was no longer youth. He was not even Jeems Bulain.

But his voice was the same. "I am sorry, Tontoutt."

Specialists Seeking to Extend Use of Honey

Ancient literature, telling of the adaptations of honey to suit the varying tastes and needs of past centuries, provides clues which scientists are now following to revive old uses and to develop the present possibilities of the product.

The early Romans in their writings often mentioned the honeybee and honey. Among the products they mentioned frequently are water honey, salt-water honey, water mead, rose honey, honey foam, and honey vinegar.

The United States Department of Agriculture is studying the chemical properties of honey and methods of inducing chemical changes in it that will open the field for new honey products. Specialists are perfecting methods of making honey candy, and some manufacturers already have secret processes for making this confection. Many housekeepers now use honey to sweeten cereals, and cakes, and generally in cooking. It is also used as a syrup on waffles and hot cakes. Eminent physicians proclaim that honey contains the most beneficial of the sugars.

Chinese lipstick in 1730. Among the Chinese paintings on glass recently shown in a London gallery was that of a Chinese young woman at her toilet in a wall-to-wall home. Although the date of this picture is about 1730, the miss was using a lipstick with all the skill of a modern flapper.

Felts Plus Feathers for Fall Wear

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

WHO would have believed that in this day and age of ultra modernism hats should dare to go romantic, beplumed and audaciously picturesque. But they have!

What's more, the new chapeau, which are so frankly mid-Victorian and a la Empress Eugenie, bid fair to set the pace for fashions in general in that advance costume displays are reflecting a Second Empire influence both as to silhouette and the many little details which go to make up the unified ensemble. Not that there is any danger of this matter of period influence being overplayed, no, indeed, not with the wise-mindedness which exists among contemporary creators of fashion. What's really happening is that the berth, the bustle (via graceful draping, toward the back) and the higher waistline are serving as inspiration for an artful and subtle interpretation on the part of present-day designers.

An interesting situation in regard to the new hat fashions is that instead of women showing a reluctance to accept them, as one might suppose, seeing that they are so radically different from anything styled for years and years, they are welcoming them with greatest enthusiasm. Of course, after one tries on several of the perky little tip-titled shapes with their decorative feathers it is easy to discover the wherefore of their popularity, for they are decidedly flattering, as a rule.

The initial chapter in the story of millinery for fall and winter is being told for the most part in terms of felts and feathers with a promising future in store for velvet to wear with dressy afternoon costume. It is the ribbon-bound felt derby with a bright little feather which as a "first" hat is in the lead for sports and practical wear about town. The model pictured at the top of this group to the left is a good reason why this type of hat is qualifying over the right one and showing the hair at the opposite side. It is a brown felt with motif of taupe and brown pasted feathers.

Another derby to the right at the top of the picture bespeaks "what's what." This one is a green velvet, for green is competing with brown for the hat of the season. The high ostrich plume which trims it takes you by surprise, for so is it written in the book of fashion for fall and winter—felt trimmed with ostrich in a picturesque manner.

The hat below to the left is a black felt. If the camera were to register the other side it would reveal a wavy coiffure arranged to the "queen's taste." The rich plume is black shading to white for the flat pasted ostrich encircling the crown with pure white for the drooping feather.

One of the very latest Parisian fashions is the soft felt which concludes this group. The black ostrich which trims it accents the picturesque.

MAKE-UP PROBLEM IN FALL FASHIONS

The new fall fashions, which emphasize vivid color contrasts, present a different problem in make-up. And the problem is all the more important because the new hats are so small that they leave the face entirely exposed, according to Katharine McCormack, associate editor of Harper's Bazaar.

The most effective make-up for fall is the one which accents a woman's natural colors, she writes in Aromatic Magazine. Fall make-up should harmonize with eyes, skin and hair and vary somewhat with varying shades of dress, she says.

"The effect of a make-up which simply accents nature is tremendously effective, without being at all blatant," she writes. "If bright shades take the color out of the face, which they undoubtedly do, the answer is to augment with a rouge that will most nearly simulate your own natural color. If you stick to the colors that are becoming to your type this rule may be easily followed."

Marquiesette Being Used Now for Milady's Blouse

Marquiesette is being utilized by blouse makers now as well as by curtain makers. Short-sleeved blouses with rows and rows of ruffles lace or net making the neckline and cuffs are being shown in the shops where best styles are exhibited. Tucked nets are popular and so are the batistes, but more marquiesette than any other kind are promised.

Latest Leather Coats Are Made Reversible

Reversible leather coats are a new and practical novelty for travelers. The new coats are made of soft, pliable lambskin lined with checkered wool. The cloth side of the coat is lined in leather along the collar and cuffs. Blue and white, dark red and ivory, brown and beige are the smartest combinations.

For Autumn Wear

Elaborate materials will be noted when the first sign of spring bring out the latest products of costume designers. In the picture beige lace is used as a background for the beautiful fur. A brown hat and brown shoes are worn.

White Raincoats Catch Fancy of Fashionable

White raincoats have captured the fancy of the fashionable. Coats and capes of various materials in snowy white are effective in the rain, from both a practical and a fashionable point of view. White cravattes and white waterproofed silk, shiny white rubber materials are considered smart. Long white capes of military flavor, some with pipings and buttons of black, are a comfortable rainy day accessory for the woman who does her shopping by motor, as it is easy to slip in and out of for the short trips from the car to the door of the market.

Lesson for September 20

THE COUNCIL AT JERUSALEM

LESSON TEXT—Acts 15:1-35.
GOLDEN TEXT—"For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another."
PRIMARY TOPIC—Christians Working Together.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The First Missionary Convention.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Christian Freedom.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Christianity at the Crossroads.

I. The Controversy in the Church at Antioch (vv. 1-5).

This difficulty was a most serious one, for it threatened the disruption of the church into Jewish and Gentile divisions. It was not a question of the admission of the Gentiles into the Church; that had been settled some years before when Peter received Cornelius and his household. The question now was, On what ground could they be received? Should Gentile converts be required to keep the Mosaic Law as a condition of salvation? This issue was brought on by the coming of certain men from Jerusalem who declared, "Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved" (v. 1). The question was so difficult that Paul and Barnabas were unable to put them to silence. These Jewish legalists had the letter of the Scripture on their side. They could point to the command enjoining this rite upon the male children of the covenant people (Gen. 17:10-14). Paul could not point to any scripture where this obligation had been abrogated. If Paul should plead that Abraham was justified before he was circumcised, his antagonist could answer, "Yes, but after justification the rite was divinely imposed." The brethren at Antioch decided to refer the matter to the mother church at Jerusalem. Accordingly, Paul and Barnabas and others were sent as a deputation to Jerusalem.

II. The Deliberations of the Council (v. 6-21).

1. Peter's speech (vv. 6-11). He argued that God had borne witness to the acceptance of the Gentiles by giving the Holy Spirit to them as unto the Jews (Acts 10:34-47). Since, therefore, God had not put a difference, it would be folly for them to do so.

2. Paul and Barnabas rehearsed their experience (v. 12). They told how that God had set his seal of approval on their preaching of salvation by grace through faith apart from the works of the law by the working of signs and wonders through them.

3. The argument of James (vv. 14-21). He took the fact declared by Peter and showed how it harmonized with the prophecy of Amos (Amos 9:11-15). He showed that the reception of the Gentiles was not in conflict but in strict harmony with God's plan. As set forth in the speech of James, God's plan is as follows:

a. To take out from among the Gentiles a people for his name (v. 14). This is what is now going on—the preaching of the gospel to the ends of the earth, and the calling out of the Church.

b. After the Church is completed and removed, the Israelitish nation will be converted and restored to their land and privileges by the Lord himself at his return (vv. 16, 17).

c. Following this will be the conversion of the world through the agency of converted Israel (v. 17 of Rom. 11:15-17). He showed that there is no conflict when the Scriptures are rightly divided.

III. The Decision of the Council (vv. 22-29).

The mother church came to a unanimous agreement and accepted the resolution offered by James. They not only sent a letter stating the decision of the conference, but took the wise precaution to send influential men along with Paul and Barnabas to bear the same testimony by word of mouth. This letter denied the authority of the Judaizing teachers (v. 24) and declared the method by which this decision had been reached (vv. 25-27). They put the Holy Spirit, first. They were positively instructed to abstain from meats offered to idols, from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication.

IV. The Decision Delivered to the Church (vv. 30-35).

Upon their return to Antioch, the church was called together to hear the report. Its reading brought great rejoicing. Judas and Silas, who had been sent as confirmatory witnesses, being prophets, now exhorted the brethren with many words, confirming the decision of the Jerusalem church.

Abiding in Christ

Abiding in Christ does not mean that you must always be thinking about Christ. You are in a house, abiding in its enclosure or beneath its shelter, though you are not always thinking about the house itself. But you always know when you leave it.—F. B. Meyer.

God Is in All

Be he nowhere else, God is in all that liberates and lifts, in all that humbles, sweetens, and consoles.—Lowell.

REDUCE OPEN SEASON ON DUCKS
County Clerk Glenn Potter has been notified by the department of conservation of Indiana of a reduction in the open season on ducks, geese, brant and coot to include the month of October only. Formerly the duck, geese and brant season extended from Oct. 1 to Dec. 15 and the coot season from Oct. 1 to Jan. 15. The reduction is made necessary by unprecedented drouth in the nesting areas of waterfowl in northern United States and Canada.

MUCK CROP SHOW AT GARRETT

Plans for the second annual Northern Indiana Muck Crop Show, to be held in Garrett Nov. 3, 4 and 5 began to take shape at a meeting Friday of the local committee with representatives of Purdue University. Details of the program, premium list, and arrangements for the show itself, to be held in the High School gymnasium were discussed.

W. B. Ward of the horticultural extension staff of Purdue, reported that more than half of the exhibit space about the walls of the gymnasium had been sold. The playing floor of the structure will be given over to space for displaying the competitive exhibits of onions, potatoes, celery, cabbage, carrots, narnips, etc. A class also will be provided for mint oil, it was announced, following discussion of displaying this product which is widely grown in the muck soil regions of northern Indiana.

MONTE L. GREEN GETS 2 TO 14 YEARS

A verdict of guilty was returned by the jury in the DeKalb circuit court Sunday morning at 2:15 o'clock in the case of Monte L. Green, former president of the Garrett Savings Loan & Trust Co., on trial during the last week on a charge of embezzlement of a depositor's funds.

The jury decided that the defendant knew the bank was insolvent when he accepted a deposit last December 31 within half an hour of the time the institution closed for the last time. The penalty is a prison term of two to fourteen years.

The deliberations of the jury began at 8:20 Saturday afternoon. John Ketel of Union township, was elected foreman. The jury consisted of ten men and two women. It is reported the first ballot was 9 to 3 for conviction and just before the jury was taken out for lunch at midnight the vote was 11 to 1. After lunch, the vote was 10 to 1, but this changed to 11 to 1 and all voted for conviction on the twenty-fourth ballot.

Court action to save their client from serving a 2 to 14 year sentence in the penitentiary was sought Monday by attorneys for Monte L. Green, former president of the defunct Garrett Savings Loan & Trust company, who was found guilty by a jury in the DeKalb circuit court on a charge of accepting a deposit when he knew the institution was insolvent.

The first step taken by the defense in an effort to keep the defendant out of prison was the filing of a motion in arrest of judgment. In this motion technical questions were raised and if it were sustained the motion would have the effect of discharging the defendant. If it is overruled, a motion for a new trial will be filed. The court deferred decision, but indicated that the motion would be denied. The law gives the defense 30 days time to prepare and file a motion for a new trial, but it is probable that such a motion will be submitted this week.

If this motion were sustained, the defendant would remain free on his bonds pending another trial. If it were overruled, sentence would be pronounced at once and the defendant would be ordered taken into custody. It is likely that the defense would then take an appeal to the state supreme court and would seek the release of the defendant pending the decision of the higher court. If Judge Endicott denies his release on bond, the defense has the right to appeal to the supreme court on this question and a hearing would soon be held at Indianapolis. In the meantime, the defendant would remain in jail. Release on bail depending the appeal may be granted under the law if the court believes there is possible cause for reversal of the jury's verdict.

If the defendant is finally required to serve his sentence on this conviction, it is unlikely that he will be brought to trial on the two indictments remaining, one of which is for embezzlement in the acceptance of a deposit from C. A. Bittikoff of Garrett, and the other for perjury in swearing to the value of his property in a depository bond furnished to Butler township.

OPEN AIR SERVICE AT-TRACTS LARGE AUDIENCE

The Rev. Homer Studabaker, pastor of the Spencerville M. E. Church is being highly complimented on the Galilean Service which was given Sunday evening at 5:30 P. M. at Dilla's River Bridge, between Spencerville and St. Joe on the St. Joe River.

It is estimated that between six and eight hundred people were in attendance at this service. The service was opened by singing, "Shall We Gather at the River." Rev. Stoll, pastor of the Spencerville Lutheran Church led in prayer. The Fort Wayne Bible Institute rendered special numbers.

Rev. Abner Elzey bringing the message. As the speaker was being rowed from the bank, the scattered crowd slowly and quietly moved to the edge of the water, wanting to catch the first word that came from the boat. At the close of the message a candle light service was given. Twenty-four candles were lit and placed upon the water. As they burned low they floated down the stream, many stood at the bank, watching until the lights were invisible. The service was closed by singing, "Send the Light, the Blessed Gospel Light."

IT PAYS

A retail merchant who does a business of $300,000 in a town of 1,300 population must be classified as a success. Here's some straight talk from such a merchant, Fred W. Anderson of Cozard, Neb.

"I have but little sympathy for the merchant who sleeps between advertised blankets or bed-springs that are nationally advertised; sleeps in advertised pajamas; who puts on advertised underwear, shirts, garters, shoes and clothing when he gets up in the morning; who eats advertised cereals and foods for breakfast; who rides to work in an advertised car—and who refuses to advertise. He will probably go broke. If I were to start in business again today I would invest 5 PER CENT of my gross sales in advertising. It Pays.

FINANCIAL STATISTICS OF THE STATE GOVERNMENT OF INDIANA FOR 1930

The Bureau of the Census announces a summary of the financial statistics of the State of Indiana for the fiscal year ending Sept. 30, 1930. The per capita figures for 1930 are based on an estimated population of 3,239,000.

Expenditures
The payments for operation and maintenance of the general departments of Indiana amounted to $30,813,946, or $9.51 per capita. This includes $4,709,332, appropriations for education to the minor civil divisions of the State. In 1929 the per capita for operation and maintenance of general departments was $9.18, and in 1917, $4.28. The interest on debt in 1930 amounted to $125,016 and outlays for permanent improvements, $20,870,085. The total payments, therefore, for operation and maintenance of general departments, interest, and outlays were $51,809,047. Of this amount $223,134 represents payments by a State department or enterprise to another on account of services. The totals include all payments for the year, whether made from current revenues or from the proceeds of bond issues.

Of the governmental costs reported above, $25,660,197 was for highways, $9,085,234 being for maintenance and $16,574,963 for construction.

Revenues

The total revenue receipts were $52,632,093, or $16.25 per capita. This was $21,693,131 more than the total payments of the year, exclusive of the payments for permanent improvements, and $823,046 more than the total payments including those for permanent improvements. This excess of revenue receipts is reflected in purchase of investments, not shown in this summary. Of the total revenue receipts $223,134 represents receipts from a State department or enterprise on account of services. Property and special taxes represented 28.3 per cent of the total revenue for 1930, 27.6 per cent for 1929, and 61.1 per cent for 1917. The increase in the amount of property and special taxes collected was 68.1 per cent from 1917 to 1930, and 10.6 per cent from 1929 to 1930. The per capita property and special taxes were $4.61 in 1930, $4.20 in 1929, and $3.10 in 1917.

Earnings of general departments, or compensation for services rendered by State officials, represented 9.5 per cent of the total revenue for 1930, 10.2 per cent for 1929, and 11.9 per cent for 1917.

Business and nonbusiness licenses constituted 48.9 per cent of the total revenue for 1930, 46.8 per cent for 1929, and 13.7 per cent for 1917.

Receipts from business licenses consist chiefly of taxes exacted from insurance and other incorporated companies, those imposed upon commercial vehicles, and of sales tax on gasoline, while those from nonbusiness licenses comprise chiefly taxes on noncommercial motor vehicles and amounts paid for hunting and fishing privileges. The sales tax on gasoline amounted to $16,832,448 in 1930, and $14,033,711 in 1929, an increase of 19.9 per cent.

Indebtedness
The total funded or fixed debt outstanding Sept. 30, 1930 was $2,654,000.

The net indebtedness (funded or fixed debt less sinking fund assets) was $2,488,156, or $0.77 per capita. In 1929 the per capita net debt was $0.74, and in 1917, $0.06.

Assessed Valuations and Tax Levies

The assessed valuation of property, in Indiana subject to ad valorem taxation was $5,161,063,113; the amount of State taxes levied was $14,967,100; and the per capita levy, $4.62. In 1929 the per capita levy was $4.67, and in 1917, $2.63.

GYPSY WOMAN AR-RESTED AND FIRED

Three automobile loads of gypsies stopped in the business district at Hicksville Thursday and proceeded to canvas the stores. Marshal D. M. Driver ordered them to move on. One of the women, who then used indecent language was arrested. Mayor Estell A. Myers fined her $1 and costs, a total of $5.60, which was paid.

This is the first time we ever heard of a gypsy being arrested and fined for anything. It has been the custom of officers to order them on.

CLUB ELECTS OFFICERS

Three Concord Township Ladies Home Bureau met at the home of Mrs. Harriett Draggoo Friday, September 18. Club was called to order by the president, singing being led by Mrs. Harriett Johnson. Among other matters of business the club voted to buy cans for hot lunch canning. Election of officers resulted as follows:

President, Gertrude Borthwick; vice president, Mary Krise; secretary, Millie Shull; assistant secretary, Arline Koch; treasurer, Clara Foltz; pianist, Lela Northrup; assistant pianist, Cora Curie; chorister, Harriett Johnson; assistant, Pluma Hamilton. Twenty-three members responded to roll call with "Autumn," two guests were present, Mrs. Marie Draggoo and Mrs. Stella Hughes. Mrs. Diadem Bone gave a short but interesting talk on "Pioneer days as compared with today." Mrs. Della Brown gave a select reading which caused much merriment. The hostess with her committee, composed of Carrie Morr, Diadem Bone and Berth Ricketts, then entertained the ladies with a couple of contests, one in which the ladies tried their skill in ringing sticks of candy with rubber rings, the lucky one getting all the sticks they could ring in three throws.

A travel contest was tied by Clara Foltz, Pauline Simantor and Mayola Kinsey, each receiving a nice dish as a reward for superior intellectuality. A feast of watermelon and muskmelon was enjoyed by all. The October meeting will be the annual guest night.

AUTOMOBILE DRIVERS TAKE WARNING

With our new automobile responsibility law going into effect Oct. 1, every person ought to study the law carefully.

The interpretation follows: "This law provides, that any automobile owner or operator who has been convicted of, pleaded guilty to, forfeited a bond or collateral given for the violation of the following traffic laws, must furnish the state of Indiana definite proof of sound financial responsibility before he will again be allowed to operate an automobile:

"Reckless driving, where injury to person or persons or damage to property of others actually results.

"Driving without a license or registration.

"Driving under the influence of liquor or drugs.

"Leaving the scene of an accident in which you are involved without making identity known.

"Homicide or assault as result of operation of motor vehicle.

"Such other violations of the law as require suspension or revocation of license.

"If a judgment is rendered in excess of $100 in this or any other state or any province of Canada arising out of an automobile accident after October 1, 1931, and remains unsatisfied, the license of the automobile owner or operator will be forthwith suspended until the owner or operator furnishes proof of financial responsibility.

"Proof of financial responsibility when once required by the state of Indiana, may be furnished by the motorist at his option in the following manner:

"By placing with the state of Indiana cash or collateral, to the amount of $11,000; or—

"File a bond of a surety company guaranteeing the payment of an amount up to $11,000; or—

"File proof that the car owner or operator has in force an automobile liability policy with limits of at least $5,000 for personal injury in case of one person; $10,000 in case of two or more persons, and $1,000 for property damage.

"Thus the least expensive and most practical plan for compliance with this law is an automobile liability policy.

"Any car owner or operator failing to return operator's license and registration certificates after failure to prove financial security, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $100.

"If any persons shall forego any evidence of financial security he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine not to exceed $500 or both."

The Bangle Necklace Puzzle

The young daughter of a certain man and woman was a very bright child, who wanted to help her parents in every way she could. Now her father was very anxious to find out what her mother wanted for a Christmas present, but could not get her to tell him what to buy. He appealed to his daughter, who promised to do what she could. A few days before Christmas she told him to watch the initials bangles that made her necklace. One evening she pointed to it and put her fingers to her lips. Her father tried for some time to make sense out of the arrangement of the letters, and finally succeeded. Can you do the same?

Megishoo

"The ship is here! The ship is here!" Megishoo was sitting in the grass playing with her Eskimo puppy. She scrambled to her feet at her brother's cry and raced after him. Every one was chattering and laughing as he hurried to the shore. The white ship from America had been there only once before, but all the Eskimos remembered the visit. "Come, let us take the kayaks (ki-yaks) and visit the white men," suggested Nookapingwa, the father of Megishoo. In a few minutes there were a dozen long, slender boats gliding when the American ship had visited her country before. Now she was eight years old. "Well, well, here we are again," said a big tall man. This was Mr. Mack, the captain of the ship. He slapped the men on the back, greeted plump babies the mothers carried on their backs, and then shook hands with all the children. "Oh, candy!" cried Megishoo looking into her hand after Mr. Mack had passed her. "Candy, American candy," laughed the other children.

One of the men from the ship suddenly put down a big black box he had been carrying. It stood on the top of three long poles.

"Come here, little girl," he called to Megishoo. He pointed the black box at her and stood waiting behind it. Megishoo backed away from him. She shook her black hair violently and her black eyes opened wide with fright.

"It's all right, Megishoo," said Captain Mack. "He wants to take your picture."

"No," said Megishoo firmly. "The black box might go off!" She did not know what might be inside of that strange machine.

"Here, I will hold you," offered the captain, "and we will have our picture taken together." He swung her up to his shoulder and she clutched his head tightly with both hands.

"That's a good girl," said the captain. "Now just think of the fun you will have visiting the ship. I have a present for you, too."

At this Megishoo's round, rosy face the women, talked to the smiling, skimming over the water to the ship where they were eagerly welcomed. Megishoo ran to the very edge of the water. She had been only a little wrinkled into smiles. She did not notice a click from the black box.

"There, that's fine," said the captain as he swung her down again. "The next time the ship comes here I will bring you a picture of yourself." Megishoo could not understand such wonderful news. Who, in Eskimo

Looking Down on the Department of Agriculture

Here is an unusual view of the Department of Agriculture group of buildings as seen from the top of the Washington monument. The center section of the long building at the left houses the offices of the secretary and was completed a few months ago. The elongated extension building on the right is still under construction.

Land, had ever heard of a picture of oneself?

"Here come the presents," said Captain Mack, as a man carrying a big bundle joined the group. The man untied the bundle and began to take out some packages.

"Here is a present for Megishoo," said the captain. He put a shining piece of wood and metal into her hands.

"Put it up to your lips and blow in it," said one of the men. Megishoo puffed and blew first one way and then another, but she could not make any sounds. Her cheeks puffed out and grew red and she almost lost her breath. Suddenly the instrument made a noise.

"Oh, Megishoo make music!" she said with a happy smile. And in a few more minutes she could play the harmonica easily.

The Kitchen Cabinet

Casseroles of Sweetbreads and Mushrooms.—Soak a pair of sweetbreads one hour in cold water, then cook for fifteen minutes in slightly acidulated water, using a half tablespoonful of vinegar to a pint of water with a little salt. Remove and chill, break into small bits, discarding the membranes. Skin and dice the mushrooms and stew them in three tablespoonfuls of butter. Make a pint of well-seasoned white sauce and add the mushrooms and sweetbreads to it. In the bottom of a well-buttered casserole place a pint of young peas which have been cooked and well seasoned, adding a bit of sugar. Pour over these the mushrooms and sweetbreads and place in a hot oven for half an hour. Cover well. Serve with radishes and cucumber as salad, on lettuce.

Butterscotch Squares.—Cook together one-fourth of a cupful of butter and one cupful of brown sugar until smooth and well blended. Cool, add two unbeaten eggs and beat well. Add one-fourth of a package of sliced dates and one-fourth of a cupful of finely cut nut meats, add one-half cupful of flour sifted with one teaspoonful of baking powder and one-fourth teaspoonful of salt; mix well, adding a flavoring of half-teaspoonful of vanilla. Spread in a pan lined with heavy waxed paper and bake in a moderate oven thirty minutes. Remove from the pan and cut into squares when cool.

Old-Fashioned Ginger Water.—This was the drink carried to the fields in jugs for the harvest workers and is just as wholesome and appetizing as well as refreshing for the porch party. Take two tablespoonfuls of ground ginger, add half a cupful of brown sugar, a dash of vinegar, a tablespoonful will be plenty, and add two quarts of cold water. Stir well and serve. Cream of tartar is used by many instead of vinegar. One teaspoonful will be plenty for this amount. With so many fruit syrups left from canned fruit one may have a different flavored drink for everyday during hot weather.

Raspberry is especially well liked, and one may, during the season, prepare a few bottles of raspberry syrup to use during the warm weather.

Squash With Parmesan.—The tender summer squash, or marrows, are used for this dish. Cut into cubes if very tender, without peeling. Fry the vegetable in butter, sprinkling with salt and mixed spice, when well cooked turn into a dish and sprinkle with grated cheese and buttered crumbs, brown under the broiler or in a hot oven.

BOBBY BURKE

Bobby Burke, young southpaw pitcher of the Washington team, who recently buried a no-hit, no-run game against the Boston Red Sox. Only twelve times before, in the history of the big leagues, had a southpaw accomplished this feat.

My Neighbor

Says:

ALWAYS keep browned flour for making gravies on hand. Brown flour in baking pan in the oven, then put away in glass jars.

If two glasses become wedged together, stand in warm water and pour cold water into the inside glass. By this method they are quickly separated.

When any portion of a velvet gown is crushed from pressure, hold the part over a basin of hot water, inside next to the water. The pile will soon be restored.

A block of paper in the kitchen, on which to jot down needed household articles is a great help.

Polish Cadets Visit New York

The Polish mercantile marine training ship for cadets, Dar-Pomorski, arrived at New York for a visit and anchored in the Hudson river off Seventy-ninth street. Furling the sails on a full-rigged ship is an intricate job. The cadets are seen making the bowsprit sail fast.

LIGHTS OF NEW YORK

by WALTER TRUMBULL

The elevated trains in New York run past some flats which have fire-escapes on the front of the buildings. The platforms of these iron stairways form little terraces for the inhabitants. On one of them, north of Fifty-third street, stands an ordinary bushel basket filled with earth. Growing there is one tall sunflower and two stalks of corn. Every time I see it I wonder if those people originally came from Kansas.

What might be termed kitchen gardens are plentiful in the city. I saw in one place a lovely hanging vine. Some one had put a sweet potato in a glass jar, which was suspended by a piece of wire. The jar was partially filled with water and the potato vine had overflowed the top and hung in long streamers. It was as pretty as many of the more expensive plants carried by florists.

I suppose many of us have, at some time or other, planted orange, lemon or grapefruit seeds. They spring up into a tiny forest of miniature trees. They tell me that one can raise tomato vines, but that in this case the seeds must be dried first, just as seed corn is dried. Those who come to the city from far away farms often raise green things in a little box on a window-sill. It reminds them of home.

Recently I learned something in this connection I never knew before. They tell me that, if you wet a sponge and sprinkle it with bird seed, you will soon find it covered with a fine, green grass. I never had any idea that bird seed would sprout. Some day I'm going to try it.

I know one owner of a penthouse who actually has some good sized trees growing in deep tubs on his terrace. He dug them up himself on a trip to the mountains. Another terrace has a framework, which supports clematis vines. The owner told me he was going to try honeysuckle, but didn't know how well it would do in this climate. Personally, I should like a cantaloupe or watermelon vine.

One trouble about my planting any seeds is that there are some pigeons from a roof down the street which pay me fairly regular visits. I found one of them recently investigating a box of earth on the porch. My wife had intended to plant something in it, but had not yet done so. The joke was on the pigeon.

I know a man who took a small plant in Westchester for the summer while his wife and children went on a European trip. He was delighted to see a green vine growing by the wall of the little garage and put up some strings to help it climb. When his family returned the vine had done splendidly. The children discovered what it was. It was poison ivy.

A butcher on Park avenue slapped a cigarette out of a woman's mouth and a judge later slapped a twenty-five-dollar fine on the butcher. After this, as far as the butcher is concerned, ladies may smoke.

Alone for 26 Years, Wife Gives Up Hope

Seattle.—The insurance of a man who has been missing 26 years was sought by Mrs. Margaret M. Otis, wife of Levi Frank L. Otis, missing since he left New York for San Francisco in 1905. Mrs. Otis believes her husband is dead and seeks his $5,000 insurance, with interest.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"Hue and Cry" WE ARE all familiar with this phrase which we know to refer to a noisy mob.

For some reason this expression seems to have all the ear marks of a pure Anglo-Saxon; however, like so many others, this appearance is deceptive, the expression being, in its entirety Gallic in origin.

We have it after the French "huer" meaning to shout at, as when a crowd is chasing somebody who is running away and "crier," meaning to scream.

Things That Never Happen

By GENE BYRNES

SO YOU'VE BOUGHT A WASHER? NOW BE SURE TO USE RINSO IN IT IF YOU WANT REAL LIVELY SUDS AND SNOW-WHITE WASHES

Good advice on washing clothes whiter—safely

You may think the soap you use doesn't make much difference—but it does! I know from experience. You'll marvel at the rich, creamy suds that Rinsol gives. And how sweet and clean those suds get the wash! Try it and see.

Don't boil clothes

Rinsol washes clothes to white, boiling isn't necessary. The makers of 40 famous washers recommend this granulated soap.

Great for rub washing, too. Soaks out dirt—saves scrubbing—saves the clothes. Essential, gives twice as much suds, cup for cup, as light-weight, puffed-up soaps—even in hardest water.

Get the BIG package of Rinsol. Use it for dishes, too—and for all cleaning.

MILLIONS USE RINSO in tub, washer and dishpan

Youthful Feet Recalled

It was 78 years ago that Frank N. Davis, of Calais, and Isaac H. Johnson, of Deering, Maine, ran up the 294 steps of the Bunker Hill monument without stopping or touching the rail. After an hour's rest, during which they cut their initials on the Adams cannon, they came down the same way—on the run.

POISON in Your bowels!

Poisons absorbed into the system from souring waste in the bowels, cause that dull, headachy, sluggish, bilious condition; coat the tongue; foul the breath; sap energy, strength and nerve-force. A little of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin will clear up trouble like that, gently, harmlessly, in a hurry. The difference it will make in your feelings over night will prove its merit to you.

Dr. Caldwell studied constipation for over forty-seven years. This long experience enabled him to make his prescription just what men, women, old people and children need to make their bowels help themselves. Its natural, mild, thorough action and its pleasant taste commend it to everyone. That's why "Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin," as it is called, is the most popular laxative drugstore sell.

The trend from towns back to the country is evidenced from the increased attendance in the public schools under the jurisdiction of Carl F. Stallman, superintendent of schools for DeKalb county. Ralph Heffley's yield 327.5 bushels of extra good quality potatoes makes him the county's first medal winner. Results are very satisfying according to Mr. Ward in regard to the interest shown and with such fine cooperation. DeKalb county slogan "Every Potato Grown a Member in 1932."

These results were checked by County Agent, T. E. Myers and W. B. Ward, Purdue in charge of the onion work in northern Indiana. ## HORSE SENSE

Coarsely ground wheat with a supplement will carry the spring pigs along in fine shape, if the corn supply is low.

Feed in the cars doubles or trebles the average death loss in shipping hogs during hot weather. Hot days aren't over.

Apples from Indiana orchards will soon be going to market or into storage. In operating a farm storage, careful attention must be paid to ventilation in order to get the lowest temperature possible.

Pure-bred rams have dropped 40 per cent in price in Indiana during the last 2 years. At a recent sale at Madison, 24 rams averaged $20 per head. Two years ago, the same individuals would have sold for $30 to $35 at public auction. Farmers can still afford to use pure-bred rams in producing lambs for market.

Farm folks, just like those in the cities, are interested in pretty farmsteads. Shrubs and flowers around a house make it a home. Many helpful hints on how to improve the appearance of the home are to be found in a new bulletin from Purdue University, "Planning and Planting the Indiana Farmstead." The bulletin is free for the asking.

RANGE PARALYSIS

(By Prof. H. D. Munroe)

At this time of the year, when the pullets are about ready to lay, many flock owners notice some of the pullets going blind, losing weight, getting lame and sometimes becoming paralyzed. This condition is called Range Paralysis. Little is known about this disease and nothing is known that will cure the trouble.

It is usually the after effect of the disease Coccidiosis and many times worms, especially tape forms, are found in flocks so affected. The owners should treat the birds for worms, cull out and kill all birds that are blind, lame or paralyzed.

From the time the pullets are housed the owner should carefully cull the flock each week. At this time he should take out any bird that is lame in any way or seems to be going blind. These birds will usually be in good flesh and can be sold for eating purposes. If this is not done the bird will soon be too thin to sell and will usually die in about a month's time. It is far better to get the market price for the pullet than to keep her until she is worthless and spend money on her for medicine that will do no good.
